This is the heyday of the twisted smile. Unless you can smile crookedly, you are lost. Time was when a "bitter" smile might finely "wreathe your lips," and all be well. There were also the "cynical," "quiet," "gentle," "excited," "faint," "grim," and "ghastly" varieties, formerly regarded as effective. But the latest note from Paris is the "crooked," or "wry," smile. Except your heroine wear it, she might as well wear nothing.

Illustrators, it must be admitted, are still afraid of the new fashion. A virgin field, indeed, awaits the bold artist who will attempt its portrayal. But it must come. The very best literary modistes have adopted the "crooked" smile, to the exclusion of all others.

It is, to begin with, the hall-mark of a perfect lady. Since the days of Van Bibber and The Girl, we have had no more ladylike characters than those of Julian Street. So, when we read in McClure's for August, "Then with a rather crooked little smile, Mrs. Railey asked," we sigh with satisfaction, just as when we inspect pictures of Newport ladies. That's what they're wearing this season, "a rather crooked little smile."

The "crooked smile" is effective in many modes. It may be touched up with irony, paradox, or fatalism. Suffrage leaders are wearing it this season, when dismissing their forlorn suitors. Thus the militant discarded the man in Miss Alice Brown's story, in the August Atlantic: "She smiled, a little wry, old smile." What could a mere Man do against a "wry smile"? Especially when the "wry" was a "little old"?

All the men are mad over the new style. Ever since sentimental Tommy noticed Grizel's crooked smile, the male idiots have been daft over it. Mrs. Gerould sets us right about this, in the September Harper's: "She smiled her sweet, crooked smile, that came out so well in life, and so badly in photographs." And again: "She smiled for the first time as she said it—her crooked smile, that we had all so liked from the beginning."

The girls like it equally well. Samuel Hopkins Adams's hero, in the August Everybody's, knew this: "The firm mouth smiled a little awry and unfailingly won her response."

The "crooked smile" is also cynical, and they're all wearing cynicism now. It's the new color. Thus Mr. E. W. Hornung, in the same copy of Everybody's: "'A new religion, in which you'll never believe any more,' said Dollar, with a wry smile."

One can use the crooked smile for emphasis, too; for the faint flavor of suggestion so necessary now. Thus, to quote Mrs. Gerould again: "'Sidney, you see'—her crooked smile accentuated the words—'will let me off, on one condition.'"

Some of the modes are, of course, extreme, and hard to imitate. Authors themselves are often not quite sure it is a smile. This makes it all the more distingué. "Some spasm of expression, that was intended for a smile."

Mr. Hugh Johnson in the September Century is responsible for the above mode. Corra Harris, in the August Harper's, is equally striking: "A slow, crawling worm of wit, showing slyly in his eyes."

The "crooked smile," however, is undoubtedly most effective when trimmed with introspection and a little spice of morbidity. This style is adapted from the Russian ballet, which, McClure's tells us, is the one great dramatic influence of our time. It is interesting to trace its influence on the smile of heroines. Fannie Stearns Davis, in the June Atlantic, has best achieved the mode; and, not to weary you, her words shall close our illustrations: "In her heart she would whisper, even while the swift, crooked smile danced across her lips, 'O God, make me remember!'"

These snapshots, taken from the very latest cry in story-forms, prove the popularity of the "wry," or "crooked," style of wearing one's lips. One may see everywhere heroines at practice under the dictate of Fashion, and yet, one may ask, why the "crooked" smile? Are our modern heroines too fond of bitter and forbidden fruit? Is it the Cult of the Ugly that has set this form? Or is the microbe of crookedness in the air, affecting politics, railway signals, and smiles?

PROFESSOR KITTREDGE AND THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH.

The distinguished scholar whose scientific curiosity burns its way through no man knows what thorny tangles of contemporary research, and who, according to common report, in his heroic vigils nightly outwatches the Bear, very possibly sat down some summer evening to the congratulatory volume marking his twenty-fifth anniversary at Harvard,* and between curfew and cockcrow digested it all, formulated his opinion on the point of each of the forty-five contributions, and slept the sleep of the just. We others, who are but "men of mould," may well content ourselves on this occasion with merely a cursory glance at the stones of this monument of honor and pass on to a consideration of its general significance. Briefly, then, let it be said that in bulk and quality it is comparable with perhaps three or four numbers of the Publications of the Modern Language Association, and that the individual articles, though for the most part of no concern to the non-professional reader, will be perused with interest by those who have reached divergent conclusions upon such points as the date of Hegetor, swan-maidens, Celtic cauldrons of plenty, the priority of the A or B versions of the prologue to the "Legend of Good Women," mediæval lives of Judas Iscariot, Vegetius in English, or Caiaphas as a Palm Sunday prophet. Let it be added that the forty-five contributors are but chosen representatives from Professor Kittredge's great following, that perhaps scores of others are chagrined that their names do not appear in the table of contents, that uncounted young Doctors of Philosophy would gladly have come bringing similar gifts with them, who, should they fall in their spring, would be pleased with the simple Grevillian epitaph—"He was a pupil of Kittredge's." Let it be noted, finally, that the entire cost of issuing the volume has been handsomely contributed by the publishers, and that the proceeds of the sale are to constitute a special book fund for the Harvard Library, to be expended under the direction of the Master.

Had it been only what some famous wit has called "a mere damned professor" lapsing quietly into the retiring age, had it been any but he, one would have been inclined to murmur, sunt hic etiam sua præmia laudi—a tolerably adequate testimonial, as academic distinctions go, to a quarter of a century spent in the self-effacing life of a scholar. But Professor Kittredge's has not been precisely a self-effacing life, he is not so far as we know about to retire, and we cannot imagine him "quietly lapsing" into anything. He has written learned books and articles on subjects ranging from "Arthur and Gorlagon" to "The Old Farmer and his Almanack," but one wonders whether his reputation would have been perceptibly less to-day if he had not written a line. He has not dulled his palm by the entertainment of newspaper reporters, nor popularized his science for the magazines, nor been a delegate to a national political convention, nor even, we believe, been presented to the Kaiser. He has kept his name austerely within professional circles. Yet he has had his way in his profession. If a ballot were taken, among those qualified to vote, on the most eminent and influential professor of English in America, who would head the list if it were not he? He has exercised, indeed, a kind of overlordship upon English instruction in this country. But whether by virtue of his official position, or his erudition, or the merit of his ideas, or by his organizing power and the singularly dynamic force of his personality, the big congratulatory volume does not indicate—is as inarticulate as a cairn on a battlefield. The occasion demands a tablet and an inscription, and perhaps the unveiling of a portrait.

I.

First of all, let us declare that Professor Kittredge belongs to that generation of great college teachers which well-informed observers tell us is rapidly giving place to a later undergrowth of special investigators. There are, to be sure, a few small colleges left in the land, which, without much regard for "productive scholarship," still bestow their pudding and praise upon the man who can master his classroom, stab the laggards broad awake, and by the venerable inquisitorial methods discover and develop the young men of parts. But generally nowadays the word is passed round among the rising generation of instructors that the way to get on in the academic walk is not to waste time on one's pupils, but to publish—it matters not what. Whatever indirect responsibility Professor Kittredge may share in the propagation of this notion, it is undeniable that his own example has not sanctioned it. When the "efficiency" experts began last spring their abortive inquiries into the time spent by members of the instructional staff in preparation for each lecture, Professor Kittredge said, as it is reported, "I shall refuse to answer; it is my trade secret." A thoroughly characteristic mot, and it helped reveal the Philistine futility of the investigation. The special flavor of it lay in one's certainty that the questionnaire would, as a matter of fact, be dropped by him summarily and with perfect impunity into the waste-basket, and in the universal recognition that as a teacher, pure and simple, Professor Kittredge is, as they say in Cambridge, "one of the glories of the University." We are thinking now particularly of that famous course in Shakespeare which for many years has been one of the good reasons for going to Harvard.

There is a persistent tradition that Professor Kittredge formed what we may call his undergraduate manner in his preliminary pedagogic experiments long ago at the Phillips Exeter Academy. It is a manner primarily adapted to young, resistant, "tough-minded" persons, and it is perhaps not unconsciously reminiscent of Dr. Boyer of immortal memory and of that older schoolmaster at whose hands John Dryden received, as he gratefully testified, the only thrashing that he ever deserved. Exponents of the new style of teaching salute their assembled pupils in the French fashion with a courteous "Gentlemen," deliver an essay spiced with epigrams, or twitter extemporaneously through the hour, bow, and disappear. Or—of another type—enter the lecture room, weary, dreary from their private lucubrations, explain that they are but fellow-workers with their pupils in the same vineyard, pull out a sheaf of ill-digested notes, and drone away till the welcome bell. The new style is based not merely on the assumption that the student is "interested in his own intellectual welfare," but also on the far wider assumption that he is interested in his teacher's intricate "special problem." In dealing with undergraduates, Professor Kittredge is an educational realist. He assumes nothing but the general ignorance, indolence, and inattentiveness of undisciplined youth. He sees congregated before him, in that curious mixture fostered by the Harvard system, boys of eighteen and men with hair as white as his own, hard students and loafers from the "Gold Coast," keen-eyed freshmen from the Cambridge and Boston Latin Schools and untrained bachelors from the soft Southern colleges, stiff-necked elderly schoolmasters who wish to "brush up a bit," and opinionated, unlicked cub professors on leave from the exuberant West. He does not cast a farewell glance about the room and dive into a manuscript. He envisages the situation. Before instruction proper can begin this unequal conglomeration of alertness and dulness, humility and conceit, must be subjugated, must be terrorized, must be welded by common apprehension into one homogeneous whole.

Perhaps the technique of terror is a "trade secret," too, but it is also a rich legend recited by every group of men that have studied English at Harvard. After the lapse of a good many years we can call up with perfect distinctness some of the Black Fridays when there was great slaughter of the Innocents. A pretty abrupt hush follows his rapid footsteps up the aisle, deepens as he seats himself sidewise and menaces us thunderously from behind the formidable blue glasses, becomes painfully intense as he rises to stride to and fro the length of the platform in a kind of tiger-tread, and the blackboard pointer, overstrained by his nervous fingers, breaks with an electrifying snap. We are about to enjoy a bad quarter of an hour. "Mr. A! How does a play begin?" "With dialogue," hazards Mr. A. "Mr. B! How does a play begin?" "With the introduction of the characters," stammers Mr. B anxiously. "Mr. C! How does a play begin?" Mr. C, who is from the Gold Coast, quietly mumbles, "I don't know." The hunt is afoot. The next dozen men go down amid derisive snickers—no one dares to laugh aloud—like clay pipes before a crack marksman. Panic spreads. Half of us refuse to answer to our names. The other half, in desperate agitation between an attempt to conjure up any sort of reply and a passionate desire to sink through the floor, shudderingly wait for the next victim, till the pursuer, at last weary of the sport, cries out, "A play begins in mediis rebus!" Then we turn to the text. "'We would not die in that man's company that fears his fellowship to die with us.' Mr. X! Explain 'that fears his fellowship to die with us.'" Mr. X proffers something very elaborato and very confused. "Somebody explain that explanation!"—this with the true Johnsonian shout. "Mr. Y!" Mr. Y moistens his lips, starts, hems, hesitates, fumbles for words. "Come! Come! Mr. Y. Time flies! Hell threats! Heaven invites!" Mr. Y shuns salvation and hangs silent in Limbo. Mr. Z ventures on a surly pleasantry and is greeted with an invitation to "come over and swap jests with me at 2:30 this afternoon." We all envy Mr. Z as we should envy a man invited to take supper in a lion's den. Like many other of the great experiences of life, it was a rigorous ordeal while one was undergoing it, but it was pleasant to look back upon years afterwards, and, like Purgatory, it was very salutary.

The instruction proper had, also, as we recall it, a powerful purgatorial quality. What has subsequently seemed to us to be Professor Kittredge's guiding spirit is happily embodied in one of the "golden sayings," to use his own phrase, of Josh Billings: "It ain't the things we don't know that makes such fools of us, but a whole lot of things that we know that ain't so." This, despite the vernacular dress, is the spirit of science, and for at least once in a lifetime it was an entirely wholesome spirit to encounter amid the bogs and fens of Shakespearean "interpretation." "War to the death," was the cry in that course, "on gushing Mrs. Jamesons, moralizing clergymen, and fantastic Teutonic metaphysicians." "There are many ways of studying Shakespeare," he told us, "but the object of this course is to ascertain what Shakespeare said and what he meant when he said it." The session ordinarily began with five or ten minutes during which we called out questions on difficult points in the previous day's reading. These he answered instantly, always without consulting the book, and succinctly or copiously as the case required. For the next ten or fifteen minutes he subjected us in our turn to a grilling examination on whatever we had prepared for the day. For the rest of the hour he commented with racy phrase and startling illustration, and left the room at the last minute, talking all the way down the aisle and half way down the stairs.

II.

For graduate students there was another manner. Jupiter Tonans gave way to benignant Jove, a being of equal or greater fascination, but with his terrors laid by, alert, omniscient as it seemed, a hawk-eyed critic still, but of princely amenity, tireless helpfulness, and the cordialest interest in one's personal destiny. This is the Kittredge of the disciples—the candidates for the doctorate—who hand down his obiter dicta from year to year, and speak of his chance commendation of some former pupil or pupil's work, as one speaks of the conferring of an Order of Merit.

There was nothing lethargic in the atmosphere of those meetings. When the analysis and destruction of a great piece of German interpretation was completed one felt such a glow of satisfaction as must have thrilled the blood of a red-handed Saxon churl when he had assisted good King Alfred in flaying off a Dane skin and nailing it up on a church door. Nor, under that leadership, did one's interest flag when occasion failed for noble rage and cannibalistic enterprise. Fired by that unrelenting ardor, one fixed one's attention with as intense a concern upon a disputed comma in a Canterbury tale as one could have felt for the most momentous crisis in the affairs of a nation. One could sit for week after week copying down under that dynamic dictation an endless ballad bibliography that one never used, nor ever hoped to use, and yet maintain through it all the spellbound gravity of one hearkening to a seraphic discussion of fate and foreknowledge absolute.

Best of all were the ever-memorable individual conferences, when the candidate, now going heavily with his dissertation, visited the arbiter of his fate by special appointment at some hour not far from midnight, and came upon him, in the midst of his study, seated at the centre of a great half-moon of tomes and treatises, and enveloped and clouded, like a god, in infinite smoke. You began the interview with a half-hour of wizardry, during which, while you helped thicken the smoke, he told you of the smoking customs of barbarians or poured out odd stories of witchcraft and alchemy in New England. Then you explained your difficultics and he cleared them up, or you told him what you were hunting for, and he pulled out of some recess or other a box full of references bearing exactly upon the point, and filed away months or years before, when he was working upon the same topic. You returned to your labors with a persuasion that there was no topic which had not, on one occasion or another, engaged his attention. You returned with a feeling, also, that your academic fortune was insured. For it may be said of Professor Kittredge, as it was said of the old Germanic chiefs, who never forgot their friends nor forgave their enemies, he has been a good "Ring-Giver."

III.

We have spoken with some fulness of the more personal side of Professor Kittredge's teaching, because it is only by dwelling upon his dæmonic energy, his relentlessly positive temper, and his passion for domination that we can make wholly credible, even to ourselves, the nature and extent of the influence that he has exercised upon the teaching and the study of English at Harvard and throughout the country. For it must be frankly admitted that he has wielded his authority against a good deal of bitter opposition, and that many who have been constrained to submit to it have been rather subjugated than pacified.

There is a current story that a certain student, hankering vaguely in his uncorrected youth for the divine elation and finding himself out of the way of experiencing it, admitted to Professor Kittredge that he was not interested in "mere facts." "I am interested," was the withering response, "in nothing but facts." Doubtless the word "facts" had a wider meaning in the retort than in the provocation, and perhaps the whole incident is apocryphal. It is none the less suggestive. It hints at a type of pitcher, not empty nor entirely worthless, that is not readily filled at that well. It is a curious matter that though for years we have heard witnesses testifying various indebtedness to their guide, philosopher, and friend, we do not recall that any one has acknowledged indebtedness to him for a "love of good literature." We are inclined to doubt whether he considers it any part of his function to impart to his students a love of literature. We are certain that they receive little encouragement from him to form opinions upon the æsthetic or other merits of the pieces with which they are engaged. Possibly an early abhorrence of elegant lecturers and uninformed enthusiasms has hardened with time into an unconcealed, somewhat contemptuous antipathy for "literary fellows," concerned with the ideas and emotions which constitute the spirit of letters. "What did you learn in those graduate seminars that was permanently useful to you?" the writer once inquired of a favorite pupil, who was teaching modern English literature. "To verify my references," was the reply, "and to transcribe quoted passages with punctilious accuracy." That was, of course, a jest. What the speaker meant was that he had carried away the technique and the ideal of scientific research. That, as we take it, is what Professor Kittredge has principally desired to impart to graduate students.

Now, it is impossible to make the study of literature a rigorously scientific pursuit without terribly impoverishing it. You cannot give it the standing of a science unless you deliberately choose to ignore those scientifically imponderable elements of thought and feeling which essentially and permanently distinguish the field of humane letters from the field of science. In the approach to these elements the scientific spirit is, as every one would admit, an indispensable lamp to the feet, but in dealing with them one must use a headlight filled with another oil. The moment that you touch upon them, you have passed the boundaries of the unvarnished verifiable fact. You are in the Debatable Land; you are in the moral world. Philosophy and religion lie before you, and ethics and æsthetics—which is not a science outside of Germany—encompass you around. You must proceed with tradition, authority, and a seasoned judgment to guide you, yet walking mainly by the "inner light." You are shoulder to shoulder with the thrice accursed "literary fellows" in the demesne of the man of letters. You are in imminent peril of becoming a literary dilettante, and there is one chance in a thousand that you may become a great critic or literary historian.

Professor Kittredge has taken few chances at making great literary historians or critics. Hating the literary dilettante with a perfect hatred, he has probably never paused to consider whether the odds are not equally heavy against the production of a great philologist, nor whether, for the service to which he is called, the literary dilettante is not on the whole about as useful a kind of humbug or mediocrity as the linguistic dilettante. Pausing, we may suspect, to meditate neither of these important questions, he has squarely turned his back upon the Debatable Land and has led his followers by forced marches into the opposite quarter of the English field, where he has taught them the elements of textual criticism and linguistic science, interested them in the editing of unpublished manuscripts and the collection of folklore, and made them all zealous bibliographers and compilers of card indexes. In short, he has been a potent force in bringing about the present sterilizing divorce of philology from general ideas. If his school has not been very prolific in important books, it should be remembered that one of its maxims is, "Any one can write a book; the difficult thing is to write an article." This appears to be a veiled way of saying that the digestion of facts, however weighty, sinks into insignificance in comparison with the discovery of facts, however trifling.

The great field for the discovery of facts, memorable chiefly because they have been forgotten, has long been the Middle Ages, and Professor Kittredge is a mediævalist. To a mind in which the master impulse is a wide-ranging curiosity this tract of literature is endlessly fascinating, by virtue of just those qualities which, to a mind with ulterior purposes like Matthew Arnold's, for example, make it seem almost negligible—its prolixity, its formlessness, its naïve superstitions, its lack of high seriousness, its insolidity of substance.

We are not so foolish as to object that an eminent mediævalist has followed his bent. Our objection is only that he has, in no very indirect way, prevented other men from pursuing their bents. There should certainly be room and following at Harvard for a distinguished scholar in the mediæval period. But there should also be room and following for men qualified to deal in a really distinguished fashion with the vital ideas and movements of English literature since the Renaissance. We will not speak for the present year of grace—conditions vary somewhat from year to year. But within, say, the last fifteen years, there have been long intervals when, barring the drama, there was almost no instruction in English offered at Harvard that an intelligent graduate student could take seriously in the period from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. There were popular "snap" lecture courses for miscellaneous good-natured auditors; but for the student who had got beyond that, neither guidance nor encouragement. When, in conformity with the printed invitation, the candidate for the higher degree unfolded to the Department his plans and desires for work in modern literature, a majestic figure waved him to a more removed ground. There was nothing on paper to indicate objection to his enterprise, but after a few weeks he began to perceive that the modern period was not, so to speak, in good odor with those in authority. There was the system which incorporated the leading ideas of the Chairman of the Division of Modern Languages, and which prepared one for research in the Middle Ages. The core of the course was prescribed and the rind very strongly intimated—Germanic Philology, Romance Philology, Historical Grammar, Old Norse, Anglo-Saxon Grammar, Beowulf, Lynewulf, Old Irish perhaps, Ballads and Metrical Romances, Chaucer, Shakespeare, another course in the Drama also desirable. It was notorious that in the grand ordeal of the far-dreaded final examination serious inquisition into your scholarship would, in nine cases out of ten, end with the fourteenth century.

Without drawing too closely the links between cause and effect we may say that the conditions prevailing at Harvard at the period which we have been describing have affected more or less seriously the teaching of English throughout the country. Departments in the older institutions with established and more humane traditions of their own have, of course, been less subject to the influence, and at least one great department has gained in prestige in proportion as it has reacted against it. It is in the small colleges and in the younger universities with rapidly growing faculties that the new generation of English teachers have been planted and have had their way. And it is when you see the newly-fledged philologist at work, teaching composition (an art which he has never practiced) and eighteenth-century prose (a sea which for him has never been charted), it is then that you begin to recognize that something is out of joint in the state of Denmark. It is when you have observed half a dozen aspiring instructors publishing in the learned journals first-hand comments on mediæval syntax, etymology, and beast fable, and uttering in their classrooms third and fourth-hand comments on Milton, Dryden, and Tennyson—it is then that you understand the vogue of the teachers who "vitalize" literature by the use of the magic lantern. It is when you have attended the annual advertising picnic of the "scientific investigators" and have compared the quality of the papers and discussions at a convention of the Modern Language Association with those of the historical and philosophical societies—it is then that you wonder why it is that, wherever English scholarship is taken seriously, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico and from the James River to the Golden Gate, all America mediævalizes. It is when you have lived for some years in an English department, and have watched your colleagues settling into the rôle of routine teachers, losing their zest for discovery or taking it as a recreation like golf, abandoning the hunt for subjects and letting the dust gather on their card catalogues—it is then that you feel what Professor Grandgent, in his Anniversary contribution, has described as "the necessity of self-deception regarding the futility of human endeavor." You feel in this "fellowship of scholars" an almost tragical lack of common interests and ideas. You feel as one wandering in an intellectual Sahara in a silence unbroken save by an investigating sparrow chirping from time to time over a kernel of musty wheat in the shroud of Ptolemy the Great.

THE FRENCH UNIVERSITY CONFLICT.

(Formation versus Information.)

PARIS, August 27.

For two years and more, a campaign has been waging against the University of France in its spirit and its official teaching, and in its pretension to form the mind and will of the French people. The foreigner who wishes to understand independently even the state of the question has to confront a literature comparable to that of some historical epoch. It is only in the light of a first fact of the collective life of France that any understanding at all of the case can be reached. This fact is that, in France, the University is in politics; and that politics is religion, just as religion too often—and anti-religion always—is politics.

The offensive in the campaign has been taken by Young France. The defence, it must be said, has all the marks of a generation already passing. After much rumbling discontent, the note of defiance to University authority was raised in the publication of "L'Esprit de la Nouvelle Sorbonne"

(Mercure de France), signed "Agathon." It was the joint work of two sons of the University, Alfred de Tarde and Henri Massis. They have continued their campaign by publishing in the present year "Les Jeunes Gens d'aujourd'hui" (Plon). Among the more decisive books which have come to emphasize their attack or give it another direction are "La Doctrine officielle de l'Université" (Mercure de France), by an avowed philosopher of Reaction, Pierre Lasserre; and "Aux Ecoutes de la France qui vient" (Grasset), by Gaston Rion, who prophesies of the coming generation and looks to the Geneva of Calvin for guidance, but has Emile Faguet, of the Academy, to introduce him. A "symposium" investigating the literary youth of France—"A quoi rêvent les Jeunes Gens" (Champion), by Emile Henriot—adds a number of representative personal letters.

For it is the formation of French youth which is at stake. These combatants, who are newly men, come forth to fight that the national genius may still be trained to aspiration and to action by the traditional Humanities, and not be immolated to materialism and the ideals of internationalism by new science.

The "new Sorbonne" which is the occasion of the campaign dates formally from the revolutionary University programmes of 1902, in which the classics were cast into the sea of elective wreckage, while modern and historical methods—the latter, it is charged, "made in Germany"—take their place. In reality, it is said, this plan of studies continues the policy of the Jacobins of the Revolution, of the idéologues suppressed by Napoleon, and of late intellectuels of Socialism and internationalism. A people like the French naturally react strongly against such a transformation imposed on them by politics. For it must be remembered that the various French universities all merge in the one State University of France, which conveys official teaching of every grade to the French people and is as much a government service as the civil administration, the machinery of justice, or army and navy.

The campaign against the University reform of 1902 was not begun in the cause of religion, although religious exasperation has gone so far as to accuse the University authorities of suppressing Latin in order to discourage vocations to the priesthood, which requires a knowledge of Latin. The League for French Culture has in its Committee of Honor thirty-three of the forty Immortals of the French Academy; twenty of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres; thirty-one of the Academy of Sciences; twenty-six of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, and twenty-six of the Academy of Fine Arts. The manifesto to which they have given their names speaks for them:

> On every side there is verified the weakening of general culture, with forgetfulness of our qualities of clearness and logic. There is talk of a crisis of French. This uneasiness coincides with the abandonment of classical studies, the discredit of Latin and Greek, and the abuse of specialization which a series of reforms has introduced in the higher as well as the secondary teaching. Above all, the reform of 1902, which was carried through with a utilitarian aim, has broken the unity and integrity of our system of studies.
>
> Experience has condemned these new tendencies. It is not men of letters and dilettanti who have proved the insufficiency of modern teaching; it is men of science, physicians, engineers, manufacturers.
>
> The League for French Culture has for its purpose to group together all who believe in the superiority of classical education.
>
> Defence of the Humanities—that is, not only of Latin and Greek studies, but of general and disinterested cultivation of the mind—such is the precise meaning of its action.

Henri Poincaré led the campaign of this League for Culture with an explanation of the necessity of training in the Humanities for the study of the sciences:

> There might be a serious objection to classical studies. If it is to be desired that nine out of ten Frenchmen become good merchants and business men, is it not dangerous to disgust them beforehand with that which is to fill their lives? No doubt, it would not be impossible to refute such an objection; but that is no business of mine. . . . I seek what must be done to form men of science. And here all is clear. The man of science ought not to tarry in the realization of practical aims; these, no doubt, he will obtain, but he must obtain them over and above. . . . Science has wonderful applications; but the science which would have in view only the applications would no longer be science—it would be only the kitchen. There is no science but disinterested science. . . . The spirit which should animate the man of science is that which breathed of old on Greece and brought there to birth poets and thinkers. There remains in our classical teaching I know not what of the old Greek soul; I know not what that makes us look ever upward. And that is more precious for the making of a man of science than the reading of many volumes of geometry.

Pierre Lasserre, who fights for other causes than French culture, defines the "accusation":

> It is said that philosophy, history, and letters no longer exist, are cultivated only by name in the new Sorbonne. That which takes their place and figures in their stead is reduced to a purely material labor of bibliography, classifying, numbering, and ticketing, of documentation and erudition blind and without thought. . . . [In the secondary education] it sacrifices that which is the object itself, the reason for existing, of the lycée or college—that is, the general formation of the mind, the formation of the man—to the fallacious utilitarianism of premature specialization. . . . With the pretext of bringing school and life as near together as possible, it asks the school to furnish data and lessons and influence and maturity which only life itself, with its experience and practice and business undertakings, can make alive—and which will live then only in minds and hearts that are prepared. Now, it is this preparation which is compromised.

Here we are on ground familiar to Americans who remember the opening of Cornell University and the early reforms of President Eliot of Harvard. It is rather the extremity of French University controversies that perplexes us. Professor Lanson, of the Sorbonne, answers back:

> Classical culture was general culture—a formal, brilliant, superficial education, a training to speak of everything without knowing anything exactly. Teaching was mainly oratorical and formal. It was a question of drilling minds to the rhetoric of the salon and the tribune; . . . to give the mind a pretty form.

While he does not judge the "formation of mind" so bitterly, Professor Lavisse does sum up the traditional classical education as aiming at the formation of the man comme il faut. He asserts that Colbert and great Frenchmen like him came from colleges where they learned nothing but Latin. The assertion is not in accord with what we know of the routine work of such colleges, and still less with the immediate mastery of life shown by Colbert and other students issuing from them. Englishmen fondly repeat that India was conquered to their country on the benches of Eton, where, besides Latin, there was little taught but Greek. Or was it on the Eton cricket field? One of these new Frenchmen, writing to "Agathon" on the revolution which is turning French youth from their University, has hit on this:

> My first criticism is that you seem to me not to attribute to athletic sport the part it really plays. I believe this part essential. It is not because the young men of to-day are anti-intellectualiste that they give themselves up to sports. On the contrary, in my opinion, it is because they go in for sport that they are anti-intellectualiste. . . . By accepting the value of sport, they have come forth from that nihilism which, you say, was peculiar to the preceding generation.

It must not be thought that we are here running up a side alley in this labyrinth of University disputes and revolutions of Young France. Automobiles and Latin, Catholic renaissance and minds formed to the higher mathematics, all turn and wind in this maze where theory is at conflict with life. For, from the whole controversy, there is one thing certain—the ultra-modern reforms of the University of France have excited not only the opposition of the older masters of French learning and science. They are diametrically opposed to the evolution of that part of Young France which seems likely to count most for the future.

Whether this wave of reaction will be sufficient to bring back classical education is another question. And whether, as Henri Poincaré, with others like him, thought, French science is to suffer from the loss of the Humanities, is yet another. A foreign observer, in an ingenious anecdote, puts the case as it is here and now—for the benefit of "Agathon":

> A notable American, who prided himself on sociology, came lately to study France. He asked to be shown the tomb of Napoleon, the Moulin Rouge, and a French peasant. . . . Most foreigners would have asked to see the Sorbonne, for the France they love and admire, though with a shadow of disdain, is rationalist, humanitarian, and decadent France—that which the young generation repudiates so violently. What is outside of that France generally escapes their notice.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

No translation of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" was known to Birkbeck Hill, most inquisitive of Johnsonians. Lord Rosebery in his address at the Lichfield commemoration in 1909 said that he had heard only of an abstract in Russian. To Hill Dr. Johnson appeared "so English that foreigners could neither understand him nor relish his Life." Even a less enthusiastic reader might vary the application of certain words of Dr. Johnson's to express the opinion that a translation "would be impossible if it were endeavored, and would be foolish if it were possible." And, indeed, the French, the Italians, the Spaniards, and the Danes seem, so far as my inquiries have gone, to have been thoroughly intimidated all these 122 years. But Dr. Hill or Lord Rosebery could have discovered from such accessible sources of information as Brockhaus's or Meyer's Konversationslexikon that once upon a time there was one, bolder than the rest, who did not shrink from the high emprise of translating the great Biography. This one was a German, and a woman.

Her Boswell is a scarce little book. There is apparently no copy in the British Museum; it is not mentioned under "Boswell" in the catalogue of printed books of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris; neither the Rothschild nor the Municipal Library at Frankfort nor the Royal Library at Munich has it; and German booksellers in a large way do not regard with confidence the prospects of procuring a copy. But one may be seen at the Royal Library in Berlin.

Its title is "Denkwürdigkeiten aus dem Leben Samuel Johnson's von James Boswell Esq." The translation was made from the second edition and was published at Königsberg in 1797 by Friedrich Nicolovius, who, by the way, must have presumed a liberal taste among the Germans for translations from the English, for he issued about the same time one of Butler's "Hudibras."

The name of the translator does not appear on the title page, nor, in full, elsewhere in the book. A dedication to some Hofrath is signed "M. L.," the designation "Uebersetzerin" under a footnote shows the sex, and a little bibliographic research soon disclosed her to have been one Dorothea Mathilde Liebeskind. More research revealed nothing further about her.

Of her version only a part was published. It is contained in a small volume of 532 pages, and extends to the letter which Johnson wrote to Boswell on March 15, 1772. The intention is expressed in a preface to conclude the last volume with a list of all the writings acknowledged by, or ascribed to, Johnson, the titles of which were, however, to be reproduced in the original language. As nothing further could be learned about the translator, it is not known why she did not finish her work. It is still true that a complete translation of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" does not exist in any language.

What manner of performance is this German Boswell, as far as it goes? The translator flattered herself that she had given an exact reproduction of the picture of Johnson in respect of the drawing as well as the coloring; but, while a degree of fidelity bordering on literalness will not be denied, the product is far from Boswell's "Flemish picture." To use an expression of Dr. Johnson's borrowed from another art, the tune is there, but not the tone. Boswell himself with delightful ingenuousness branded as "cold-blooded and morose mortals" those "who dislike this Book"; we should be less severe towards the Germans if their indifference discouraged the completion of this translation.

THE SCHOLAR AND THE LIBRARIES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Joseph De Perott expressed in your issue of August 21 what was evidently heart-felt exasperation with our public libraries. Although I have no hope of convincing him by my reply, I should, being at present a librarian and formerly having been a college instructor, and so knowing something of his kind, like to say a few words in answer to his points of criticism.

His first grievance is that he was supplied with no list of Spanish novels of chivalry printed before 1650 when he asked for a list of such of these as were in the possession of the libraries of Boston, New York, and Washington. Either the libraries possessed none of the novels, or, through what was to him inexcusable ignorance of Spanish novels of chivalry, they were unable to answer his question. In the first place, I should like to call attention to his unwillingness to give all the help he could have given in answering his question, because this is a characteristic attitude on the part of library users, and I regret to say more especially on the part of college professors and other "scholars" who are the very ones who should realize the value of precision. In this case, Mr. De Perott evidently had at hand a complete list of the novels he wished, namely, that in the "Biblioteca de Autores Españoles." It would have made his question easier to answer, and would have saved probably hours of search on the part of some underpaid library assistant, if he had sent a copy of this list to the libraries in question, asking them to check off those books in their possession; for then a few minutes' consultation of the catalogue would have given him a precise answer. Or if he could not take the time from his scholarly activities to copy this list, he might at least have given the reference to the "Biblioteca," for the chances are a thousand to one that the Boston and New York libraries at least have this bibliography. To be sure, the ideal reference librarian would have consulted his Spanish bibliographies, but even the best are not ideal, and demands are many. Furthermore, if the gentleman had taken the pains to consult Mr. Whitney's catalogue of the Ticknor collection in the Boston Public Library, he could have answered his own question as far as one library was concerned. I have no doubt he could have found this catalogue in the Worcester Public Library or in the library of Clark University. Apropos of novels of chivalry and roguery, it might be interesting to know, shocking as the knowledge would prove, how many college graduates could tell what a picaresque novel is. At least I congratulate Mr. De Perott and the ignorant world of librarians and others that, in spite of American libraries, the recent article in the "Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen" was not still-born. Alas for the Athens of America!

The next point of criticism is that books are bought by libraries only when there is a demand for them, and that many rare books useful to scholars are not in our public libraries even when they might have been bought by the alert librarian at a merely nominal price. If the gentleman is speaking of public libraries supported by public taxation for the use and education of the masses, I am inclined to think that the consensus of unscholarly opinion would be that the public cause might be farther advanced by the purchase of other books than an Italian translation of the Greek novels or than a copy of "Il Sacrificio degli Intronati." Aside from wise appropriation of public funds, mere physical limitations make it sensibly clear that public librarians should be careful not to load their shelves with books which would be used rarely or almost never by a very limited class, when by so doing they must exclude books that would be of use and benefit to many readers with needs which are vitally real if not scholarly. One has a right to expect Harvard or Columbia or libraries that have primarily scholarly aims to have such books as Mr. De Perott speaks of, but even in the case of a huge university library such as that of Harvard, the mere storage of little-used books is a serious problem and will continue to be so even with its new building. Not long ago, if I remember accurately, President Eliot spoke quite strongly on this point and advocated separate storehouses of books which a university library should have, but could not afford to shelve with its books more generally used.

From personal experience, I can say that this criticism that libraries buy only books demanded is unjust, for I know that librarians of college and reference libraries are on a constant lookout for books of this very sort. Recently several of the reference and university libraries of Chicago have combined to send a representative to Europe for this purpose, and this present summer this representative is in South America searching for rare and valuable books. Consequently, from only a slight knowledge of the matter, I am very sure that, although Mr. De Perott has been disappointed in several cases, his general criticism is not well founded in the case of libraries which might reasonably be expected to cater to scholars. Also he must remember that general libraries cover the whole field of human knowledge, and that the specialist in any particular subject must expect to find a proper balance among the various branches.

As for the "American notion of cataloguing books from the title alone," an examination of one of the printed catalogue cards of the Library of Congress, the John Crerar Library, Harvard College Library, or the Boston Public Library—say a card for one of the incunabula—will make one wonder if the present critic is entirely familiar with all the methods of American cataloguing.

A lack of courtesy is always to be deplored, and the evidences "of centuries of half-education" are extremely irritating to those bearing the weight of centuries of culture, but what are we to expect in the letters of poor maiden library assistants, when scholars write in their letters sentences like the following: "Now, the late Dr. Furness had a copy of it, and I have three of them, but a person who should ask for it at an American library would probably get nothing but a stare"?

"HEREOS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The word at the head of this note appears, so far as I know, in not a single dictionary, old or new, and it has dropped, as regards its real significance, into absolute oblivion. Yet it occurs in two of the classics of English literature, and an adjective derived from it (although this origin has never been recognized) is one of the key-words of a famous third.

The well-known description in the "Knight's Tale" of the pains of love which Arcite suffered, ends with the lines:

> And in his gere, for al the world he ferde
> Not oonly lyk the loveres maladye
> Of Hereos, but rather lyke manye
> Engendred of humour malencolyk
> Biforen, in his celle fantastyk (A 1372-76).

The word Hereos has puzzled Chaucerian scholars from Speght and Thynne until now, and the generally accepted explanation—that it is a fourteenth-century attempt at Eros—is wrong. Hereos is a technical medical term, used by the mediæval physicians whom Chaucer knew (among them his "Arnold of the Newe Toun" and the Bernard whom the Doctour of Phisyk had read) for a specific and well-recognized malady, which can be traced in the treatises on medicine from Galen and the later Greek writers through the great Arabic physicians and their followers straight down to Robert Burton. Moreover, it explains a well-known crux in the "Philobiblon" of Richard of Bury, and it throws an entirely new light upon the origin and significance of the adjective heroicall in the "Anatomy of Melancholy" and elsewhere. And finally, it has very direct bearing upon the paraphernalia of conventions summed up under the name of courtly love. The subject, however, is too wide even to sketch in a note, but its unusually varied interest, both human and literary, seems to warrant this brief preliminary statement.

RURAL SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The improvement of our country schools, especially in the Eastern States, is a most important educational duty at the present time. Until the children in our farming communities are properly instructed, we cannot expect the growth of stanch and intelligent men and women, similar to those who founded our nation, and fitted properly to develop our agricultural wealth. A great difficulty is that in many country districts there is no one capable of selecting proper teachers and of supervising the instruction given. Consequently, I suggest that county school committees shall be chosen, who shall appoint teachers for the rural schools, direct the instruction to be given, and care for the school buildings.

THEORIES OF TEACHING.

Among recent educational books several may be mentioned as sources of special information. Since the first edition of "Medical Inspection of Schools" (Survey Associates, Inc.), by Gulick and Ayres, was published by the Russell Sage Foundation in 1909 there has been a threefold increase in the number of American cities having systems of medical inspection, and a new edition brings the subject up to date. "The Conservation of the Child" (Lippincott), by Arthur Holmes, is a study of defective children and a description of the work done by the Psychological Clinic of the University of Pennsylvania. Prof. Frank M. McMurry's "Elementary School Standards" (World Book Co.) is an attempt to estimate the quality of the teaching, the course of study, and the supervision by the principals in the elementary schools. The investigation was part of the New York City School Inquiry, and a wealth of illustrative detail makes the book at least an instructive study. "The Kindergarten" (Houghton Mifflin) consists of three reports by Susan E. Blow, Pattie Smith Hill, and Elizabeth Harrison, appointed by the International Kindergarten Union to formulate the theory and programme of the kindergarten. One gets the impression that the kindergarten is rather overloaded with Hegelian philosophy. Laura L. Plaisted's "Handwork and its Place in Elementary Education" (Frowde) is a rather full and well-illustrated practical manual. W. J. Gibson's "Education in Scotland" (Longmans) is a short and convenient sketch of the history of Scotch education and recent movements. For those who may be interested we mention Emma Sheridan Fry's little handbook of "Educational Dramatics" (Moffat, Yard).

It is a good deal of a question whether formal instruction in morals can be made effective in the schools; and in any case it is a question where to begin. The second question is treated sensibly and clearly by Prof. E. Hershey Sneath, of Yale, and Dean George Hodges, of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, in a readable manual entitled "Moral Training in the School and Home" (Macmillan), which also points the way to a quantity of useful material in the form of illustrated stories. It is worth noting that stress is laid upon the nearly forgotten household virtues as a point of departure.

As a specimen of the noisy and pugnacious in pedagogical literature, we recommend "Youth and the Race" (Scribner), by Edgar James Swift, professor of psychology and education in Washington University. The one thesis that emerges from this "study of the psychology of adolescence," with its ramble of edifying illustrations, including dialect stories and newspaper quotations, is that, where school and child disagree, the truth lies with the child; and for dramatic effect the tension of the disagreement is greatly exaggerated. By virtue of the special illumination afforded by primitive racial instincts (such as those manifested in "the spirit of the gang"), the child knows much better than the teacher what is good for him; and, as everybody knows, it is the bad boys that have the real stuff in them. Everybody knows, too, that teachers as a class are a set of blockheads; "it is no idle charge that teachers do not know what they are trying to do." "The racial and social instincts are exhaustless storage-batteries of nervous energy, and"—but this should be enough.

"Problems of Educational Readjustment" (Houghton Mifflin), by Dr. David Snedden, Massachusetts Commissioner of Education, is a clear and effective presentation mainly of the problems of liberal versus vocational education. Dr. Snedden knows what he means and has the gift of stating the issues simply. The distinction between the logical and natural methods of introducing a subject is neatly put by saying that the logical method is that of the adult mind. Hence, the logical method is not rejected as pedagogically meaningless. His position is that, while the "fundamental principles" of grammar or science, or what not, are barren as a method of approach—which must be based upon some concrete and natural interest—they represent the form of organization at which we must aim. Education is then a gradual substitution of logical and scientific categories for natural. This Aristotelian compromise reflects his general educational attitude. The essence of liberal education is to be found in the conception of man as a user; vocational education looks only to the producer. Much that he points out in this connection is instructive—for example, the contrast between the relatively barren results of the conventional musical education, which aims at proficiency of execution in the few, and the neglected possibilities of musical appreciation in the many. Yet we may wonder whether, in his emphasis upon "democracy" and "citizenship" as fields of life and enjoyment, he has appreciated the full scope and import of the citizenship implied in a truly liberal culture. Otherwise, why question the importance of Greek life and literature? In the matter of liberal and vocational education Dr. Snedden again seeks the best possible combination, but his main point is that, however combined, the two forms of education are in idea and method radically different and should never be confused. Manual training and like things have indeed a place in liberal culture; they stand for a broadening of experience and of sympathies; hence, they should be taught from this point of view rather than from that of technical proficiency. But in vocational training the academic point of view should be replaced by that of the workshop, with workshop hours, rules, and clothes. Above all, the work should be actually productive and the product as far as possible salable. Otherwise we miss the most important element in vocational training, which, as Dr. Snedden thinks, is the discipline of really productive work. We may doubt if the point has been better stated.

ENGLISH.

By all means the most significant contribution to rhetorical study in a great while is Prof. W. T. Brewster's addition to the Home University Library, entitled "Writing English Prose" (Holt). Indeed, it would be hard to imagine anything more illuminating—so perfectly does it mirror the vices and follies inherent in the present system of teaching rhetoric as a practical art, or, one might say, handicraft. In the ingratiating tone commonly assumed by writers on the subject, Professor Brewster begins by assuring the anxious reader that there "is no cause for alarm," since the study of literary composition is "simply the human process of making more intelligible or more interesting or more persuasive what you are going to write or what you have written." Alas, that it should be impossible in anything short of the original compass to do justice to the manner in which Professor Brewster addresses himself to the solution of this simple problem! All that can be done is to illustrate his exemplary perspicuity of statement and charm of style. "Narration," we are told among other matters, "is engaged in salting down what has happened or is imagined to have happened and is primarily engaged in looking for new events to salt down," while "exposition is striving to place new ideas, concepts, inventions, etc., in the cold storage of reality." Nor shall we readily forget the touching and beautiful figure of the Renaissance "as having turned up its toes and being laid out for decent burial," or of the thesis of a composition as "the fork or spit which toasts the facts before the fire of genius."

These, however, are but minor graces. The most characteristic thing about Professor Brewster's book is the absence of anything like a solid intellectual content. Take a subject like argumentation, which has been thoroughly systematized in the course of centuries and whose classifications might be made an occasion of mental discipline. And the same remark is true of figures of speech. And yet under the former head there is nothing more than a loose and rambling discussion; while this latter does not even appear in the index. But why continue? The book is a sad one; what value it has is due to the reflections it suggests. There is one, indeed, which seems vital to this whole matter. After all, the basis of expression is the sentence; that is fundamental. But of the other units of discourse so called, which modern composition has spent so much of its time working up, it may be questioned whether they are not more or less artificial and factitious in the form in which they have come to be presented today. At all events, it is in sentences that we actually write. Now a sentence is only the formulation of a judgment, and as a result the "art" of writing consists at bottom in the ability to form judgments. There is no way of getting around this difficulty; a piece of writing is worth just as much as the judgments included in it—no more. No amount of talk about language or composition, no amount of exhortation or ingratiation on the part of the instructor can take the place of judgment in the writer. Hence the absurdity of the modern rhetoric, which light-heartedly engages to make writers, regardless of mental immaturity and indiscipline. And not only the college student—almost everybody is in that plight nowadays. Wherefore this pother about composition, since in an abeyance of thought expression must always become a matter of tremendous anxiety. On the other hand, this was the advantage of what we have come to speak of as the old education; it had very little to say about original production, but it did do something for the student's judgment finally; it knew nothing about composition, but it had some notion of intellectual discipline, and in training the student's judgment it did at the same time prepare him to write.

Among recent reading books and texts there are several which deserve attention. "The Golden Deed Book" (Macmillan) is a rather interesting volume, from the fact that its selections are chosen, first of all, for the moral instruction they are supposed to convey more or less indirectly. As in so many of these readers, the range of choice is rather broad, embracing such titles as Wordsworth's "The World Is Too Much with Us," Markham's "The Man with the Hoe," and William Finnemore's "The Boy and the Cigarette." But on the whole, it is instructive to see how representative the collection is of the best modern English literature and how persistently that literature seems to have founded itself on moral ideas. "The Riverside Readers" (Houghton Mifflin), the seventh and the eighth of which are now issued, have a certain originality of plan. Besides the ordinary reading matter, they include a "study of authors," which consists of a biographical sketch of some writer by the editors, followed by a set of characteristic and appropriate extracts. In this manner each volume introduces the pupil to the life and the work of six or more important authors, American and English.

For advanced reading H. S. Murch's edition of Carlyle's "Hero-Worship" (Heath) is a conscientious piece of work. It contains a sufficient introduction with enough of the ordinary critical comment for its purpose, and is adequately provided with notes. In his edition of "Robinson Crusoe" (Scott, Foresman), W. T. Hastings seems to have taken extraordinary pains with the text for this sort of work and has published in the back a collation of several of the early editions. The volume is introduced by a life of Defoe, together with some remarks on his place as a writer. The appendix contains Steele's account of Selkirk and Capt. Rogers's narrative of his rescue.

"Matter, Form, and Style" (Dutton), by Hardress O'Grady, is an interesting little book for several reasons. It is designed as "a manual of practice in the writing of English composition," and is aimed in the first instance at a British audience. To what lengths the teaching of original expression is now carried, abroad as at home, becomes evident from a few of the exercises in the handbook. In his own instruction Mr. O'Grady believes it "more human and humane to get first the creative act and then shape the thing created." To this end presumably he recommends, among other things, as admirable practice for the student the making of sonnets on set subjects; such as, "a wave coming in and rising to its crest (octave) and then breaking smoothly round (sestet)." He also assigns a series of triolets on such themes as "the dog is jumping up at the cat, who is furious." And yet in spite of these extravagances the book is not wanting in shrewd and suggestive remarks. Style, for example, is defined as sincerity; and there is a certain illumination in the antithesis of classic and democratic literature. The difficulty is that such matters are incidental to the purpose and require for their appreciation the possession of the very faculties that they are intended to cultivate.

CLASSICS.

Prof. J. C. Egbert's edition of "Livy, Book XXI, with Selections from Books XXII-XXX" (Macmillan) is an elementary college textbook designed to present the most important episodes in the Second Punic war in one volume. There is a very brief introduction, which hardly deserves the name. The meagre commentary contains the necessary historical information combined with elementary syntactical and linguistical notes and a large amount of translation. On the assumption that a college freshman needs a very elementary book, this edition is excellent, but if, after four years' high-school training, such an edition is still necessary, the high-school instruction must fail of its purpose.

Our supply of introductory Latin books has been increased by the "Elements of Latin" (Heath), by B. C. Smith, and the "Latin Ladder" (Macmillan), by R. W. Tunstall. Both of these books are by teachers of long experience who try to embody here the secret of their success. Neither book shows any striking novelties of method, and both ignore the recent agitation in favor of more "direct" teaching. In the "Elements of Latin" we find the order of the grammar followed in the presentation of the forms, as Professor Bennett advocates, and almost all syntax excluded until the forms have been mastered. The exercises consist of detached forms and sentences nearly equally divided between Latin and English, while connected stories are deferred until the twenty-fifth lesson. In the "Latin Ladder," on the other hand, we have the piecemeal presentation of forms, with verbs and nouns alternating, only three cases, nominative, genitive, and accusative, being given in the first twenty-one lessons. Syntax is introduced early and systematically developed, while connected stories of the history of Rome are introduced as early as the tenth lesson. A neat device of review questions at frequent intervals keeps the student stimulated, and a great deal of attention is paid to the mastery of vocabulary, the words being assembled in convenient lists. In external appearance the books differ radically. The "Elements of Latin" shows an open, pleasing page, while the "Latin Ladder" is closely printed, and encumbered with footnotes. This packed appearance is due largely to the presence of much unnecessary "talk" to the pupil. This is wholly lacking in the other book. Both books are good, but the "Latin Ladder" shows a surer grasp of recent theories of teaching as well as a more exact acquaintance with syntactical progress.

A "Latin Reader for Beginners" (American Book Company), by F. A. Gallup, comprises the familiar old fables, a few simplified short stories, also well known, with various tales of early Rome adapted from Livy and a few odds and ends. The very elementary notes are at the bottom of the page, while a vocabulary gives further assistance. The collection is not uninteresting and may serve a useful purpose.

A more advanced book, "Sight Reading in Latin" (Ginn), has been prepared by H. H. Bice. The pupil is supposed to have read two books of Cæsar and the material here offered is somewhat more than the equivalent of books iii and iv, required by the New York State syllabus. Some introductory selections from Gellius, Pliny, Cicero, Livy, and Nepos lead up to the selections from Cæsar, which are chosen from the "Civil War" and books iii-vii of the "Gallic War." A serious attempt is made to teach vocabulary systematically, as well as the peculiarities of word-order, and the absence of a vocabulary emphasizes the word "sight" in the title. The book is carefully planned and ought to be welcomed by teachers as a rational attempt to develop systematically the power to read at sight.

Messrs. H. F. Scott and C. H. Van Tuyl have followed up their "Cæsar Composition Book" (1910) with a "Cicero Composition Book" (Scott, Foresman & Co.). This is, like the former, frankly a drill-book, the exercises consisting of detached sentences based on the Latin read, but grouped to illustrate particular syntactical constructions. The explanations show in general the influence of Professor Hale and often err on the side of minute distinction, but the plan is good and the material well chosen. A selection of recent college entrance examinations is added for testing purposes.

MODERN LANGUAGES.

In his "Graded French Method" (Holt) Prof. W. F. Giese, of the University of Wisconsin, starts from the principle that in the study of foreign languages reading should from the beginning hold the central place instead of grammar. His own particular way of fusing reading and grammar is a highly original application of the old pedagogic maxim: repetitio mater memoriæ. In each of the twenty-two graded chapters he begins by an effective statement of a certain amount of grammatical theory, and then illustrates this theory, not by disconnected sentences, but by three "readings," in very fluent and idiomatic French (the first two narratives, the third usually a dialogue), in all of which the same vocabulary appears. This is followed in turn by a "drill" for oral as well as written use, and by passages for rendering into French, also connected and based in vocabulary on parts of the previous "readings." "Thus," says Professor Giese, "in the reading-matter of the fourth chapter, the student will meet nearly two hundred regular present-tense verb-forms, in the fifth chapter as many imperfects, in the twelfth as many partitives, etc. . . . In combining this insistent repetition of given elements of grammar with the equally insistent repetition of a given vocabulary, I have had to reproduce, not once but several dozen times, the performance of the ingenious Arab who arranged overnight a thousand random words so as to impose on them meaning and logical sequence (it is added that his hair turned white in the process)." The remarkable fact is that in spite of the formidable obstacles imposed by his system of multiple repetition the author contrives to be light and entertaining. One is inclined, indeed, to wonder that a person capable of so much wit and ingenuity should deign to write grammars at all. The staider type of teacher and student will no doubt be disconcerted by the constant irony with which Professor Giese treats persons and things usually accounted respectable—for example, German doctoral dissertations, women's clubs, humanitarians, and Victor Hugo—and will set him down as a cynic; but even they can scarcely fail to be amused. On the whole, the book strikes one as an unusually successful attempt to sugarcoat the grammatical pill, and should receive careful trial, especially in first-year college classes.

Martin Schmidhofer's "Erstes Lesebuch für amerikanische Schulen" (Heath) is intended for children who are fortunate enough to begin the study of German early. Those who come naturally by some knowledge of the language can presumably use the book to the best advantage. An admirable spirit pervades it. Besides appropriate anecdotes, it includes many riddles and poems and some well-selected songs with music.

"German for Beginners" (Holt), by Eduard Prokosch, is a manual in three parts: Texts, Exercises and Lessons, and a Synopsis of Grammar—the whole preceded by a good Introduction on pronunciation. The Exercises and Lessons, printed concurrently on opposite pages, are based upon the Texts, and furnish material for practice in German and for drill in grammatical forms; in other words, for inductive teaching, supplemented by the learning of paradigms. The Synopsis serves the purposes of reference and review. The texts are intelligently chosen, and the pedagogical elaboration of them is thorough. The book contains sufficient material for at least a year.

It is to be regretted that E. C. Hills and S. G. Morley, in compiling their anthology of "Modern Spanish Lyrics" (Holt), did not limit their field to the nineteenth century; for if they have aimed at providing a handbook enabling the student to trace the history of the Spanish lyric from the fifteenth century down, they have failed of their purpose. Obviously, the twenty pages devoted to the period prior to the eighteenth century give the student no adequate conception of the development of the lyric through the ages, and might better have been omitted. One notes with surprise the omission of names like Boscan, Garcilaso de la Vega, and Gongora in a collection which includes a Canción of the Portuguese Gil Vicente, a writer principally noted as a dramatist. Certainly Garcilaso is the greatest lyric poet of the period in question; and while the editors may be justified in their hostility to Gongorism from the æsthetic point of view, the historic importance of the euphuistic movement is so great that at least one specimen of a poem written in that manner should have been included. The criterion of selection seems to have been a desire to include only those poems which would be likely to interest the student. But it may well be questioned whether modern mediocrities should be preferred to classic authors, merely to humor indifferent students. The nineteenth century is fully and adequately treated. The foremost Spanish poets of the century just past are all well represented. In addition, selections are given from the leading poets of Argentina, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Mexico, Nicaragua, and Venezuela. The highest praise that can be meted out to these facile rhymesters is that their output compares favorably with that of the mother country. There is to be noted the same melodious flow of words expressing the same shallowness of thought. In their notes, the editors have been accurate, scholarly, and as copious as space permitted. The introductory treatise is superior to any similar study in English. The history of Spanish lyric poetry is a short, convenient guide for the beginner, and remarkably free from error. The publishers deserve especial credit for the handsome form in which they have issued this textbook.

Teachers of Spanish grammar will welcome Prof. E. S. Ingraham's excellent "Brief Spanish Grammar" (Heath), a revision of Edgren's once popular, but now almost obsolete, textbook. Professor Ingraham, while retaining many excellent features of the original, has wisely omitted much superfluous philological material which only served to bewilder the beginner. His aim has been practical and pedagogic. The whole course is comprised in thirty-eight lessons, and the study of verb forms is completed in lesson eleven. The vocabulary is well chosen rather than extensive; the exercises consist of simple sentences. While in no sense a grammar of reference, the book is a valuable first aid to beginners.

HISTORY.

Most American histories have been written from the political and constitutional point of view, a large proportion have shown strong national or sectional bias, and a considerable number, especially in recent years, have attempted to treat our national annals as a confirmation of particular schools of the philosophy of history. Prof. J. P. Bassett's "Short History of the United States" (Macmillan) belongs to the very small minority which escape inclusion under any one of these heads. He has given just and well-proportioned emphasis to social, economic, and military factors as well as to political. A Southern man with Northern education and residence, he has held the balance remarkably even between the sections. He has deliberately and successfully avoided the extreme and the doctrinaire. Keeping in mind his purpose to explain the early history of the United States, he has not allowed himself, in describing the colonial period, to be over-influenced by the recent and able writers who stress the theory that colonial history should be regarded primarily as a part of English history. The difficult problem of selection and elimination of super-abundant material has been skilfully handled. The writer has preferred to give adequate accounts of the topics chosen for treatment rather than to include all items for which frequent mention in earlier works has created a tradition of historical importance. Accuracy of a high degree characterizes the book. The style, though not brilliant, is clear and terse, occasionally a little stilted, but on the whole well adapted to historical narrative. It is perhaps asking too much in a work which frankly relies upon other investigations for much of its material to expect satisfactory treatment of the first half of the eighteenth century. Its history has not been adequately written by earlier historians, and it remains in this work the neglected period. The national period is, on the whole, handled with a surer and a firmer grasp than the colonial.

Prof. Hutton Webster's "Ancient History" (Heath) will be acceptable to the teachers who think that military and political affairs have had too large, and social and cultural affairs too small, a place in our historical textbooks. It draws liberally from the wealth of information which recent excavations in Oriental and classical lands have made available. Of the 639 pages of text, fully 300 are given to describing manners, institutions, art, literature, and other phases of civilization. Archæology is explained, both as to methods and as to results, and there is a wholesome critical spirit in the treatment of tradition, whether it be Oriental, Hebraic, or classic. The style is pleasing, as it should be in an elementary textbook, and the narrative is not overburdened with details. There are many useful illustrations, and the index is adequate. Much praise must be given, also, to the bibliographical suggestions. The large amount of attention given to antiquities and life necessarily shortens that which can be devoted to history in the older sense. If we must have in one textbook all that the author has felt impelled to treat in this book, probably no better distribution of space could be made; but it is a question if the pupil would not have a more vivid, and consequently a more permanent, mental picture of what he is expected to know if the subject-matter were taken in smaller assignments treated on a larger scale. It is not essential that a high-school student should aequire a knowledge of all history from its beginning to the death of Charlemagne, even in outline. It would be better if he knew the significance of Greece and Rome as contributors to later history, and knew them so fully that he would have a reasonably clear and warm consciousness of the Grecian and Roman spirit.

A new editlon of Professor McLoughlin's "Hlstory of the American Nation" (Appleton) brings the narrative down to the inauguration of Woodrow Wilson. Much of the original text has been changed. The author's facility of clear presentation, which has made his book a favorite in many schools, is maintained, spite of much condensation in the recent period of his history.

SCIENCE.

The rapidity in the change of attitude towards the teaching of mathematics is emphasized by the "Calculus" (privately printed) of Professors Franklin, MacNutt, and Charles, of Lehigh University. The calculus, as here treated, is a means to express the principles of physics and engineering. Little effort is made to develop the subject as a branch of pure mathematics, to insist on rigorous deductions, or to train the student to solve formal problems. The authors are convinced "that it is a pedagogical mistake, in a textbook on calculus for young men, to break the thread of the textual discussion by unnecessary algebraic developments and by large and frequent groups of purely formal problems." So the formal problems are collected in an appendix where some ingenuity will be required to find them. A textbook by Professor Franklin is sure to be original and interesting. He has also the faculty of seeing problems clearly and solving them simply. As an aid to students who desire to know the applications of the calculus to physics, no better text could be found, but we cannot help wondering how they will get the ability to solve problems after they understand the principles. Mathematicians have rather stubbornly refused to teach mathematics except as an end in itself, or to shorten their courses by fusing more or less together such related subjects as geometry, trigonometry, and algebra. Whether their method is the best is open to question, but they are correct when they maintain that a rigid course in mathematics, with persistent practice in the art of solving problems, is essential to the training of the physicist and the engineer. We have never been able to develop a school of theoretieal physics and engineering in this country, largely because our students do not have a training which puts the technique of mathematics at their fingers' ends. It is still to be proved that it is not better to let mathematicians teach the theory and art of their subject and to require the physicist and the engineer to teach its applications. With the present scheme, our college students seem increasingly unable to deal with mathematieal problems.

A rather useful book on "Electrie Arcs" (Van Nostrand) has been prepared by Prof. Clement D. Child. The treatment is elementary, but a fairly good descriptive text of the theory and applications of the are is given.

The third and concluding book of "The Silver-Burdett Arithmetics" has been issued by the press of that company. The plan of this arithmetie is similar to that of the first two parts, which have been reviewed in these columns.

Two new books, "School Algebra" and "Academic Algebra" (Ginn), have been added to the well-known and popular Wentworth-Smith Mathematical Series.

Prof. Alfred Monroe Kenyon and Louis Ingold have written a "Trigonometry" (Macmillan). The book follows tho modern method of teaching mathematics by its practical applications. The text is short, but the tables are unusually full and are conveniently arranged.

Whenever Prof. J. M. Coulter, of the University of Chicago, prepares a treatise for the use of students of botany, he is sure to make it well proportioned and clear. Careful examination of his latest venture, "Elementary Studies in Botany" (Appleton), shows that he has kept both of these points constantly in mind. But let no purchaser be misled by the title into thinking that this volume is a primer in words of one syllable. It is a comprehensive and straightforward statement of the essentials of modern botany, with a definite object kept constantly in view, namely, of introducing the beginner without loss of time into that part of the field of botany which borders upon horticulture and agriculture. This introduction to what may be called practical botany is accomplished without the employment of unnecessary technical terms or conceptions. Therefore the volume is not only useful, but is readable and interesting.

"Agronomy" (Ginn), by Willard N. Clute, is an excellent treatment of this department of farming. Being limited to the study of plant production, it can be used to advantage in city or town as well as in country schools. It is adapted to high-school pupils, but has the advantage of being simple in both language and plan. Many of its illustrations are new, which is not always the case with textbooks, and all of them are to the point. The book is practical, and can be recommended.

Animal husbandry, the complementary department of farming, is treated in "Animal Husbandry for Schools" (Macmillan), by Merritt W. Harper. The extent of this subject, the need of many tables of figures for the study of rations, and the widely different animals that must be included, make the writing of such a book difficult. Mr. Harper's is compact and clear, is thoroughly illustrated, aud by its laboratory and class exercises is properly fitted for use in high or agricultural schools.

In the same Rural Textbook series, published by Macmillan, "Farm Management," by G. F. Warren, offers to farmers a complete and very timely handbook on a subjcet which in future must be more and more considered. The problem of successful farming was never more pressing or more difficult than now, and every aid which science offers should be at the service of our agriculturists. Whether to farm at all, and, if so, how, where, and by means of what equipment, how to market, and how to keep accounts, are questions examined by Mr. Warren in an interesting and suggestive, but also a very trustworthy, book.

In "Animal Geography, the Faunas of the Natural Regions of the Globe" (Frowde), Marion I. Newbigin attempts to set before the geographical student the main facts which relate to tho distribution of animals. This subject is in direct line with tho trend of modern evolutionary study, and offers a large field of intensely interesting research. Tho present volume is ovidently intended for the uninformed layman or the beginning student. Tho facts are obviously given at second hand, but have been drawn from trustworthy sources. Tho chapters deal successively with tho fauna of tundras, coniferous forests, steppes, mountains, tropical forests, deserts, islands, the sea, lakes, rivers, and caves. No effort has been made to reproduce any realism or the atmosphere of the respective zones, and comparatively little correlation among the facts themselves, so that steady reading is but dull work. The best sections are those dealing with the tundras and the tropical forests. If something of the spirit of Gosse or Renshaw had permeated the text, the "student" would take more joy in his work and the subject would appeal to a much wider circle of general readers.

A wholesome innovation is the correction of wrong popular names, as prong-buck for prong-horned "antelope," and prairie marmot for prairie "dog." It is a case of the mote in the brother's eye, however, for in the European names such nomenclatural purity is not always maintained. The title of the chapter on steppes is misleading, as it treats in addition of prairies, pampas, and deserts. The paragraphs on arboreal adaptation of organisms to life in the tropical forest are excellent and should have been the pattern of treatment held to throughout. Most of the illustrations are photographs of mounted museum specimens which show the structural adaptations fairly well; there are in addition Himalayan and other views. It is difficult to speculate why such impressionistic paintings as that of the snow leopard were admitted. A brief outline classification of animals forms an appendix for "readers who are not well acquainted with modern zoölogy," but such an audience should have been attracted by more entertainment in the main body of the book. The index is inadequate and of use only for referring to the various organisms as such, and not in relation to their distribution. As encyclopædia articles these chapters would be admirable, but as a bound animal geography they leave much to be desired, and for either comprehensive views or detailed reference one had better turn to Wallace or to Scharff.

STATESMAN AND GENTLEMAN.

The Windham Papers: The Life and Correspondence of the Rt. Hon. William Windham, 1750-1810. With an Introduction by the Earl of Rosebery. 33 portraits. Two vols. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $10 net.

"Why may not the life of Windham be written by his letters?" asked a writer in 1831. To-day, a century after the statesman's death, a conscientious editor, whose identity is not evident, shows that a life can be so written very successfully. The editor has limited himself to the briefest kind of explanatory comment, mostly relegated to footnotes and not always quite accurate. Windham is an especially good subject for a biography of this kind, for he himself was a writer of very unusual charm and he was the constant recipient of familiar letters from such eminent and interesting persons as George III, Burke, Fox, Pitt, the Grenvilles, Cobbett, Hazlitt, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Burney, Mrs. Siddons, and many others.

The Windham Papers, which were acquired by purchase by the British Museum in 1909, and from which the bulk of the material here published is drawn, comprise ninety-four volumes, almost all of which, with the exception of the Windham-Burke letters, have never before been printed. They are of considerable historical value, not only as a mine of information concerning Windham himself, but also as throwing light upon English domestic politics and foreign policy during the French Revolution and Empire. About 1782, when past thirty, Windham also began to keep a somewhat sentimental and introspective diary—"My confidential book; in this will be contained all those thoughts, memorandums, notes, reflexions, &c., which no eye must see but my own." By the time of his death this intimate journal swelled to fourteen large volumes, and affords an exact, though painful, picture of Windham's character. It also reveals why it was that he did not achieve more in public life. It is full of vacillation and endless agitations on the smallest activities of daily life. He seemed to worry himself with his pen. Lord Rosebery thinks it would have been better for Windham's reputation if some judicious friend had put the whole diary behind the fire. Lord Holland and Charles Greville have intimated that parts of it could not with decorum be made public. All this may be true; but if the editor was wise to publish any of it—and we think he was—he would have been wiser to publish more.

William Windham was, according to the universal testimony of all those who knew him, a man of very unusual personal charm. In conversation, where he was at his best, he could be earnest, playful, and eloquent. He had the attractive faculty of appearing to give his very best to the persons with whom he was conversing, and the spell of his fascination was complete. Even Dr. Johnson admitted him, when a mere country gentleman of twenty-eight, to his famous club, and, in his declining days, to his bedside. "Such conversation," wrote the dying sage, "I shall not have again till I come back to the regions of literature; and there Windham is inter stellas luna minores." On Windham he bestowed a Greek Testament, with his views on religion and with injunctions for the protection of his faithful servant, Frank.

Windham was a man of bodily vigor. Like the Greeks he loved youth, beauty, and manly exercises. His own many-sidedness was Greek-like, and quite in harmony with his genuine love and knowledge of the classics. He had the robust old English liking for boxing, and was known in his youth as "Fighting Windham." In advanced years, when he could no longer put on the gloves himself, he often attended the matches of others, and the technical comments in his diary show that he looked on with the eye of an expert as well as of an enthusiast. He once started on a voyage to discover the North-West Passage, but at Bergen gave it over on account of sea-sickness. In 1785 he wrote: "From the moment of my hearing of balloons"—which were as much a novelty and a danger in his age as monoplanes in our own—"I felt, in common I believe with every other man of the smallest imagination, the wish of adventuring in one." He therefore speedily made his will, wrote out a confession of his religious faith, and procured his balloon. Burke wrote banteringly:

> Adieu, Star triumphant, and some pity show
> On us poor battlers militant below.
>
> I think you are the first rational being that has taken flight. What time will you receive the congratulations of your Terrestrial Friends on your return to Mortality?

Windham's own comment in his diary is very characteristic:

> Much satisfied with myself; and, in consequence of that satisfaction, dissatisfied with my adventure. Could I have foreseen that danger or apprehension would have made so little impression on me, I would have deferred going till we had a wind favourable for crossing the Channel.

We quite agree with Lord Rosebery in hazarding the opinion that Windham was a flirt. He gave young ladies volumes with dedications in pedestrian verse of his own making. He chided his friend Cholmondeley for lightly engaging the affections of Miss Cecilia Forrest, whom he married himself with singular secrecy thirteen years later, and yet he himself had been similarly engaging the affections of a daughter of Sir Philip Francis; a lady endeavoring to console the unhappy girl told her that Windham had long hesitated between Miss Forrest and a devoted widow. He was also welcome in the evening by the fireside of the beautiful Mrs. Siddons, and he wrote intimate and affectionate letters to Mrs. Crewe; he even records his agitation on meeting her the first time after his own marriage. But his flirtations were rather the result of his conversational fascination and whimsical nature; they were, in Lord Rosebery's phrase, "unconscious, innocent, and honorable."

In public life Windham was "not a strict party man," not a very hard worker, and not very ambitious—three serious defects in any one who wishes to attain leadership in politics. He entered Parliament from Norwich in 1784 as a Whig; accepted an office in Pitt's Tory Cabinet from 1794 to 1801; went into the Opposition and was intimate with Radicals like Fox and Cobbett until in 1806 he again accepted office under Lord Grenville as Secretary of State for War, in the Administration derisively known as the "Ministry of All the Talents." This apparent political fickleness, which led him to be called by turns a Foxite, a Pittite, and a Grenvillite, was, however, more apparent than real, and more creditable than censurable. It sprang from his strong independence of mind, and the fact that he preferred freedom of opinion and action to party regularity. As an independent, and as a follower of Burke, who exercised a great influence on his mind, Windham naturally favored many things in the programme of each of the two great parties, and he made no secret of his opinions. He was the enthusiastic advocate of Roman Catholic Emancipation, but the bitter enemy of the French Republic and the unflinching opponent of parliamentary reform; he slew one Reform Bill, as with a smooth stone from a brook, by saying effectively: "No one would select the hurricane season in which to begin repairing his house." As Secretary for War for seven years under Pitt, sharing the duties of the office with Dundas, Windham exercised an important influence upon England's conduct of the war against France, for Pitt was not a military man; "I distrust extremely any ideas of my own on military subjects," he wrote to Windham in 1794. Windham was personally present for a time with the English army in the Netherlands, and had the courage to write Pitt firmly of his own conviction of the utter incompetence of the Duke of York as commander-in-chief. This was a difficult and delicate duty, for he was fond of the Duke and had received much kindness and confidence from him. It was an especially embarrassing matter to recall the Duke just at this time, as he had been forced to a series of retreats, and recall would look like official censure for failure. Pitt, however, took the hint, and the recall was soon arranged in a way which hurt no feelings, but which relieved the army of the incubus of an inept commander. Windham carried on an extensive correspondence with the French royalists, and was the man chiefly responsible for the sending of the ill-fated expedition to Quiberon. But in fairness to him it should be added that it was not Windham's plan which was responsible for this failure, but the folly and cowardice of the French émigrés, to whom he entrusted the execution of the plan. During his years at the War Office he attempted some reforms in the service, "but the few pebbles which he left on the shore of military history scarcely constitute a memorial cairn."

Of the letters to Windham which are here printed perhaps the most interesting to American readers is the sixteen-page letter of June 1, 1793, written from Philadelphia by some unidentified French royalist. It is a survey of the political men, parties, and conditions in the "Unitate States" from the point of view of an intelligent foreigner, written "in English to prevent you to read a bad French hand."

CURRENT FICTION.

The House of Thane. By Elizabeth Dejeans. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.

"Missouri's my State, and I don't want a better," declares this hero who had found money in oil in half a dozen Western States, but who could never fulfil his dream of founding his house and perpetuating his name outside of St. Louis. The author is equally free from any dread of provinciality, and her story of the American money-maker, his wife, his mistress, and the woman he should have married gains immeasurably by its flavor of local speech (something very distinct from dialect), and from the unpremeditated snatches of description in which she communicates her familiarity with the Missouri metropolis and the California oil fields.

The plot contains many situations that are tritely sensational and sentimental; an adored son is proved illegitimate and an unselfish mistress disembarrasses her lover by going off to die alone. Yet the story puts in a clear light many of the wrongs that men and women do each other in unions not founded on mutual love and respect. The extent to which the barbarous assumption that money can purehase the rights of love still persists in the mind and common practice of "the money-making animal" is disclosed with considerable shrewdness, though without any trace of cynical intention. For many reasons the book is more likely to appeal to the untutored appetite for fiction than to a highly cultivated taste. For one thing, it is carelessly written, and many of its clumsily contrived phrases make rough reading for those who value verbal niceties. For another, the characters might almost be dismissed as conventionalized types, were it not for the perspective of emotional history that opens up behind each of these figures.

Courtin' Christina. By J. J. Bell. New York: George H. Doran Co.

Those popular favorites, Wee MacGreegor and Christina, now appear in conjunction. MacGreegor has been at his chosen trade of "pentin'" for some years; Christina is the assistant and mainstay of a vague old-maid dealer in "stationery and fancy goods." MacGreegor has had his youthful amours, but the sight of Christina in a red blouse blots them out forever. The courtship which ensues is as quaint as would be expected of the amusing pair. Christina is a canny soul, and the means by which she causes him to abandon his pentin' for a career of greater promise are as old and as solid as the hills. The atmosphere of Caledonian humor in which the narrative is steeped need not be analyzed for readers who are familiar with this author's knack.

WO_2. By Maurice Drake. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

The mysterious letters that form the title of this book the reader guesses at once to be a chemical formula, but he guesses many times before he discovers what the strange mercantile company is doing with the material thus designated, which it is importing from Holland to England. In fact, this is a detective story in which the amateur sleuth is a character whom Mr. Locke might have created, and in which the events unroll with a zest of ludicrous surprise worthy, almost, of Mr. Birmingham's "Spanish Gold." Most of the action takes place on the sea, and the talk is of a salty flavor wondrously learned and quite delightful to a landsman. It is not often that detective work, vagabond adventure, and love-making are more pleasantly mingled.

Murder in Any Degree. By Owen Johnson. New York: The Century Co.

Mr. Johnson, whose "Stover at Yale" brought him into the field, is making hay while the sun shines—hay of somewhat uneven quality. The tales in this collection show more versatility than seriousness. The title story is the best of the lot, from the serious point of view, a study of marriage versus art. "One Hundred in the Dark" handles a confessedly trite situation in a novel way; it is the kind of yarn which stands or falls by its "thrill." "A Comedy for Wives" deals with another ancient situation in a forced and vulgar fashion. Mr. Johnson's humor is not his strong point. He should reserve it for such material as that of "Even Threes," a golfing tale of unusual merit.

LITERARY LONDON.

London in English Literature. By Percy H. Boynton. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. $2 net.

"No, sir," declared Dr. Johnson, "when a man is tired of London, he is tired of life; for there is in London all that life can afford." Mr. Percy Boynton, American though he is, would, we fancy, be tempted to subscribe to the Doctor's axiom. At any rate, his interest in London is so keen that he has been able to find, if not a new, at least a different angle from which to view and describe the city. While, as he says in his preface, "nothing is included in the volume which cannot be easily traced by reference to standard works on London and obvious sources of literature," we have to admit his claim that the exact method and purpose of the present book have, so far as we can recall, never been anticipated. Mr. Boynton has set himself to reproduce, in chronological order, the contemporary atmosphere of successive literary periods in the history of London, and the principal value of his achievement, as he intended it should be, is in its suggestiveness.

The book is written primarily for the student of English literature—doubtless it is the outcome of Mr. Boynton's experiences with his own students—and we shall be guilty of no disrespect towards the author if we liken his work to the tempting hors d'œuvre that whets the appetite for the more solid repast. There are a dozen topics touched on and passed by concerning which we would desire more information, or would wish to join issue; but it is atmosphere with which Mr. Boynton is concerned, and when with a few bold strokes he has indicated how men lived and moved and thought in a given period he is ready to pass on to the next picture. As a sop to our curiosity, or more probably as an ingenious bait for those students at whom he is constantly looking out of the tail of his eye, to each chapter he appends a brief catalogue of "illustrative readings," works, modern and contemporary, which will throw further light upon the figures and events which he has only adumbrated.

Mr. Boynton has done what he set out to do so extremely well that one is tempted to wish that the limitations he imposed on himself had not been quite so rigid. Even at the cost of slightly increasing the scope of the book, the topography of the city in the various periods described might advantageously have been dealt with in greater detail. In this connection, too, it is unfortunate that the maps and plans included in the volume are reproduced on too small a scale to be of great value. On the other hand, it must be recorded that Mr. Boynton has been singularly successful in avoiding the "sketchiness" and lack of cohesion which are liable to be the faults of a book of limited dimensions dealing with a wide subject. At the same time that he is directing our attention to particular aspects of his subject he never allows us to miss the synoptic view or to lose sight of the continuity of London in letters, in history, and even in topography. The transitions from one period to another, their co-relations and their contrasts, are very deftly suggested.

It is perhaps to be regretted that Mr. Boynton did not elect to close his book with the excellent chapter on "Victorian London." In writing in the final chapter of "Contemporary London" his perspective, as was perhaps inevitable, seems for the first time to be faulty, and in some of his observations he comes perilously near to the platitudinous. Curious mistakes on the part of an author usually extremely careful occur on page 199, where the Prince of Wales is described as the "Crown Prince," and on page 275, where Charles II is represented as the monarch who was condemned to death. The value of the book is enhanced by a discriminating selection of illustrations, ancient and modern, and by an excellent appendix of "illustrative novels."

Concordanza delle Rime di Francesco Petrarca. Compilata da Kenneth McKenzie. New Haven: Yale University Press. $10 net.

The completion of this volume, upon which Professor McKenzie has been engaged for several years, will be regarded as something of an event in scholarship, not only in this country but abroad. Italy, in particular, has reason to be grateful for the interest which Americans have shown in her best literature; for owing to their labors we now have concordances to the minor Italian works and the Latin works of Dante, to the "Divine Comedy," and to Petrarch's "Rime"—truly a notable achievement.

Although the influence of Petrarch has been known for a century and more to have been enormous, the use of Professor McKenzie's systematic lists can scarcely fail to add much which has escaped detection. Not only did Petrarch's language largely shape the procedure of Renaissance lyrics, it entered, in one way or another, into nearly every literary type which was used in that period; and his analysis of detached moments of life had its effect—indirectly, if we mistake not, even on the Romanticists. His relation to the lyric is in some ways more vital than that of Seneca to the drama, for not only did he catch up and hand on themes and attitudes of classic Greeks and Latins, but opened to art what must seem to moderns the closed systems of the troubadours and the dolce stil nuovo. So that through him, if allowance be made for a few later borrowings from ancient times, in particular a revival of Anacreontics and of Horace's calm reflective mood, the modern lyric appears like the outcome of a steady unbroken stream starting in antiquity. To grasp fully what Petrarch's writings meant to Europe is an important work for future scholarship, the preliminaries of which have been admirably accomplished by Professor McKenzie.

As the basis of his concordance Professor McKenzie has taken the text of Salvo-Cozzo (Florence, 1904), but he has constantly consulted the manuscripts of the Canzoniere in the Vatican Library which were rediscovered in 1886 and part of which proved to be in Petrarch's own hand. The absence until recently of a definitive edition has given rise among editors to great variations of arrangement and numbering of the poems; and to make his concordance widely serviceable, Professor McKenzie furnishes a comparative table of first lines, as recorded in such editions as those of Salvo-Cozzo, Mestica, Carducci and Ferrari, Soave, and Marsand. In a preface written in Italian the author fully explains the details of his system, which need not be described here more than to say that in general he has followed the methods adopted by Sheldon in the concordance to Dante's minor Italian works. All words, except the commonest particles, etc., are recorded, progressively, as they occur in the text; verbs are grouped under the infinitive, adjectives under the masculine singular, after the manner of a dictionary. In the case of the Trionfi the excellent text of Carl Appel (1901) has naturally been followed.

Only frequent use of this work can fully test its accuracy, but a somewhat searching experiment with it here and there by the reviewer has failed to disclose any mistakes of numbering or of printing.

Ellen Key. By Louise Nyström-Hamilton. Translated by A. E. B. Fries. With an Introduction by Havelock Ellis. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25 net.

Mrs. Nyström-Hamilton's biography of Ellen Key throws some desired light upon the personality of this interesting woman, though as a whole it is rather unsatisfactory as a study of character and in information meagre and vague. Of external events, as a matter of fact, there is little to record. Ellen Key (the name was originally the Scotch "Mac Kay") was born in 1849, of a race of squires and statesmen, and passed her childhood in the wholesome atmosphere of a country home. Later she spent her winters in Stockholm as the companion and secretary of her father, Emil Key, who was a member of the Riksdag. By 1880 Emil Key had spent his fortune in the interest of the Liberal party, and Ellen began a career of nineteen years as a high-school teacher. She had always been a student, and in 1882 she began to give public lectures, embracing a variety of subjects in history, sociology, and literature, before the People's Institute of Stockholm, which had been founded by the husband of her biographer. From this point dates her literary output, of which, it should be said, the discussion of sex relations forms a rather small part. It seems clear that she had no special ambition for publicity, and her prominence as a critic of the institution of marriage was in a measure provoked by the action of the authorities when, in 1889, four young men who had given expression to some crudely radical views concerning the marriage relation were imprisoned under an old statute against blasphemy. With no sympathy for their manner of expressing themselves, Ellen Key felt that their imprisonment was nevertheless a crime against freedom of speech; and in view of a general indifference she felt called to their defence.

Ellen Key is a single woman, and her biography records not so much as one "affair." Apparently, the philosopher of love has been too busy. Her biographer resents indignantly the "slanders" that have been heaped upon her; and her resentment is so far justified that no one who reads Ellen Key carefully could associate her with anything vulgar, however unconventional, though vulgar episodes may plausibly be referred to her for authority. Yet it is scarcely fair to scold an unenlightened public for supposing that "Miss Key lived as she preached," and on the other hand a defence of the champion of love's freedom by the standards of Mrs. Grundy seems a trifle irrelevant. Her biographer also resents the imputation that Ellen Key's insistence upon freedom in marriage represents the morbid preoccupation of an old maid. Rather, should we say—in spite of sixty years and a well-seasoned intellect—the uncalculating idealism of youth. For the practical fact about marriage seems to be that every marriage, however well founded in mutual sympathy, presents a problem. There are always some differences of temperament, become important through close association, between which compatibility is still to be effected. In Ellen Key's philosophy the possibility of creating compatibility plays no part, as, indeed, her biographer notes. Marriages are made in Heaven. Men and women are either compatible or incompatible, once for all; and when they are incompatible the marriage is to be dissolved.

It is then no surprise to learn from Mrs. Nyström-Hamilton that Ellen Key's writing is the fruit of intuition rather than of logic, and that she is even somewhat baffled by the requirements of grammatical construction. Her work is a curious combination of the naïve and the profound. It contains many passages hardly to be surpassed for virility and nobility of conception and for penetrating insight; and then again passages which, taken in themselves, seem to countenance a scandalous frivolity and libertinism. It seems clear that when Ellen Key writes she is absorbed in the thought of the moment and in the aspect of the question which is immediately before her, and it is left for the reader to find "the complementary contradiction and restriction" which would give her exact meaning. The effect of this upon the thoughtless and dissatisfied is likely to be demoralizing; but this will not permit us to deny that the writer herself is a high-minded woman whose personal sympathies are sound and wholesome.

Tibullus: The Corpus Tibullianum. Edited, with Introduction and Notes on Books I, II, and IV, ii-xiv, by Kirby Flower Smith. New York: American Book Co. $1.50.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge the debt which American classical scholarship owes to Professor Smith for this edition. We have here not only the first commentary in English upon the whole text of Tibullus, Sulpicia, and the anonymous elegies of the fourth book, but we have an edition which in minuteness of scholarship, sympathy and acuteness of interpretation, and extended knowledge of similar literature in other languages combines the excellencies of Earle's editions of Sophocles and Shorey's edition of Horace.

The most obvious criticism is on the form. As one of a series of school and college textbooks, it is restricted by various limitations of space and style, notably evident in the Introduction, which, though extensive (94 pages), still of necessity omits many important details of discussion. However, Professor Smith always sets forth his own views clearly and adequately, and the ample footnotes supply the bibliography necessary for verification. Then, too, the text, embracing the whole corpus Tibullianum, is printed solid (66 pages), while the critical variations are relegated to the Appendix. These should be more extensive and should appear at the bottom of the page. The same limitations of space have probably caused the omission of a commentary on the third book and the "Encomium Messallæ" (IV, i). It is true that these elegies are distinctly inferior to the genuine work, but the addition of a brief commentary on them would have made the book complete.

Professor Smith is not so much a textual critic, as a student of language and literature. These two characteristics dominate in the extensive commentary (344 pages). This is written for the university student and the student of comparative literature. Here are no futile "grammatical" notes intended for the young collegian, who still finds it difficult to construe, but such grammatical notes as find place are elaborate and exhaustive treatments of word meaning and syntactical phenomena, in which every available bit of information is cited and weighed. Many of these notes remind one of Mayor's commentary on Juvenal, without its irrelevancies. Parallels in ancient and modern literatures are lavishly quoted, as a rule in the language in which they are written, and to get the full benefit of the notes the reader must be familiar with French, German, and Italian, in addition to Latin and Greek. While Tibullus has had no such influence upon later literature as Horace and Virgil, it is remarkable how many real parallels are here collected.

Great interest centres in the Introduction, which treats of the Development of the Elegy, the Life of Tibullus, Later Tradition and Imitation, Criticism and Discussion, etc. The most important chapters are the first two. In the first the editor sketches the history of this most fascinating but elusive department of literature from its earliest appearance, when it seems already fully developed in all its moods, down to and beyond Tibullus, "to whom belongs the distinction of having given artistic perfection to the department on Roman ground." Owing to the many uncertainties due to the almost total loss of early Greek elegy, this discussion should have been much longer, for many students will not have ready access to many works cited in the footnotes. The chapter on the life of Tibullus furnishes an excellent example of literary criticism. Our external information regarding Tibullus is extremely scanty, while the references to himself in his poems are so vague and so inextricably interwoven with the inherited literary machinery of the elegy that nothing positive can be deduced. Here Professor Smith is at his best. His extensive studies in this department, his delicate humor, and his power of divination have enabled him to reconstruct a charming personality who, while a prominent figure in the literary circle of Messalla, was at the same time a much loved companion of Virgil and Horace.

History of the People of the United States. Volume VIII. By John Bach McMaster. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.50 net.

Thirty years have passed since Mr. McMaster began his "History of the People of the United States," the final volume of which now appears. He ends abruptly with the inauguration of Lincoln as President. The volumes of Rhodes continue the story, though after quite another method; and thus, for the first time, we have an elaborate history of the United States from 1789 to 1884. Channing has already covered the Colonial period, but with nothing like the same detail. A final chapter by McMaster, describing the general situation in 1860, and in the same form as his first chapter in the first volume, would have been interesting, if only to furnish a measure of his development during the progress of his work.

In that time a new school of historical writers has been trained. Mr. McMaster began to write soon after special departments in history and economics were established in our leading universities, the first effect of which was to show the essential defect in the work of the accepted writers of the time. He has been quite consistent in his methods, and from the beginning has placed his main reliance upon contemporary newspapers. From these he summarized state papers, political declarations, and the more obvious symptoms of social movement, selecting with judgment and combining with skill, so as to form narratives of special incidents. The connection may be of the slightest, chiefly chronological; but the result brings into relief a number of almost forgotten social facts, abortive or fruitful in later improvement—early evidences of movements still in action. As an open field for social development and experimentation, the United States offered an opportunity for appreciating social forces. Without training in economics Mr. McMaster is on this matter at once suggestive and weak. The ten years covered by this volume marked the fullest development of slavery in the South; but no attempt is made to show its evils and its supposed advantages. That the year 1860 should have found the people willing to enter into extreme protection, even under cover of a war necessity, receives no explanation, and his treatment of the wages question carefully avoids any connection with the tariff. Nor while describing the growth of cities does he suggest the beginnings of the political "boss," surely a distinctive creation of municipal opportunity. He is strong in collecting a large number of items on a certain subject; but too often these elaborate compilations lead to no conclusion. Names and incidents, called into activity by a special occasion and exerting only local influence, might judiciously have been pruned so as to permit the introduction of matters of permanent importance.

If the filibusters against Cuba and Nicaragua deserve notice, would not commercial reciprocity with Canada, of strong and lasting influence on the economic development of the Dominion, demand at least mention? The opinions on Lincoln's capacity expressed by individuals of all parties were even more remarkable than those cited from the Democratic press. The economic dependence of the South on cotton, which led to a political assurance of its power to coerce foreign nations as well as the North, is only casually mentioned; while the intensely bitter sectional hatred of the South against New England escapes attention.

The paraphrasing of newspapers involves dangers which Mr. McMaster has not escaped—those of monotony and prolixity. Contemporary opinion needs to be tested by severe analysis, for it suffers from all forms of distortion. In biography this distortion is an advantage; it gives the personal equation of the subject, and the frame or setting of the biography corrects the most marked defects. But Mr. McMaster is the most impersonal of historians. He rarely expresses an opinion beyond the adjective he uses in the narrative, and nowhere has he sought to outline the character of a leader. Lincoln, Buchanan, and Brown are no more to him than a steamboat, a railway, or an anonymous writer in a village newspaper. These well-known names appear and disappear as occasion offers, but the cause of their existence and the result of their agency are equally ill-defined. With a style which lends itself to the picturesque, the volume is singularly lacking in that quality. The trial of John Brown and the Mountain Meadows Massacre are related in the same terms as a political convention; and to the summary of the Lincoln-Douglas debate, though called in the chapter heading "the great debate," is assigned no more space than is given to the visit of Kossuth.

In paraphrasing from a number of sources confusion is created. Many of the paragraphs read as if made up by the "clippings editor." In drawing his material from many sources, without regard to the standing or influence of the source, skill in piecing cannot avoid this confusion. In a paragraph on North Carolina in 1860 a single sentence is taken from each of seven journals. In an attempt to estimate public opinion in one State this is justifiable; but the method fails when public opinion on the repeal of the Missouri Compromise is to be defined. On pages 267-268 a part of the paragraph is taken from D. D. Field; but the relation continues in the same tone without credit given to any source. The reader must decide if it is Field who is still speaking, or some unnoted authority. Then, too, in drawing from those who have made special studies in the same period Mr. McMaster might have been more liberal of credit. In this case criticism of style and method is in place, because much more is demanded of this last volume than of the first. Not only has the subject broadened, but the reader is more critical. He looks for something beyond a compilation from printed sources. Mr. McMaster does use manuscripts, but haltingly and unskilfully. He has dipped into the Webster, Buchanan, Stanton, Hammond, and Dreer collections, but the results are not striking and show the author to be out of his true element. Nor has he done what was needful in some instances. Injustice is done to Col. Higginson in making him remain at Worcester after the failure of Brown's raid. He wrote letters to his colleagues crying out against the cowardice of deserting Brown in his extremity, for which they were in a measure responsible; and, in disguise, he went to Harper's Ferry to see what could be done to aid the doomed man. A request would have obtained from the Department of State the instructions given to McLane (p. 437); the name of the Tennessee paper of divided political allegiance might have been given. Of positive errors a few may be noted for correction: It was Daniel S. Dickinson, not Daniel A. (p. 168); Troup, not Troupe, of Georgia (p. 178); Amory Laurence, not Amos (p. 203); and Donelson, not Donaldson (p. 265).

After all is said in criticism of methods and results, Mr. McMaster has shown great industry and no little discrimination during the progress of his extensive undertaking. Others will find his volumes a great storehouse of facts, presented in an attractive manner. He is not to be compared with Henry Adams; he has not the breadth, certainty and sweep of Channing; he lacks the poise and personal element of Rhodes. He must stand as a highly trained compiler, possessed of a style which sometimes betrays him into unexpected weaknesses.

A Preface to Politics. By Walter Lippmann. New York: Mitchell Kennerley. $1.50 net.

Cleverness, cynicism, humor, and common-sense, together with a liberal infusion of that curious credulity that is so distinguishing a feature of modern "advanced" thought, all expressed with a liberal sprinkling of epigram, make of Mr. Lippmann's book pleasant reading and a gentle stimulant to thought. He has read his Chesterton to some purpose, at least so far as style is concerned, and he has yielded his philosophic soul to the allurements of Bergson and the Pragmatists of the most ultra school. He has made his act of faith in that "modern philosophy" which in its vigorous revolt from the deadening mechanistic theories of Spencer and his day has placed the will in its new found "freedom" on the throne of the universe, wholly autonomous, wholly creative, wholly loosed from the trammels of a past which concerns it not, and wholly lord of a future which lies at its feet. Without following him in subscribing to this somewhat portentous and highly dogmatic creed, one may cheerfully assent to some of his suggestions and criticisms upon present tendencies. His view of the business of politics is that of an intelligent socialist. "It is perfectly true that that government is best which governs least. It is equally true that that government is best which provides most" (p. 266). In these phrases he seems to sum up the fundamental idea of his system—if, indeed, he would allow that he has a "system," and he probably would not! And when we come to ask what government is to "provide" we get the idea that, instead of a mechanical repression of "evil" by police power (what he calls the "taboo"), the statesman will strive to find a "moral equivalent" for that evil (in the manner of James in the case of war) and will furnish an innocent or even useful expression for the impulses and desires which in their perversion give birth to wrongdoing. (It is not clear that Mr. Lippmann believes in the existence of any wrongdoing which has not "social" consequences; if he does he has not said so, and one gets the impression from his book that he does not.)

But it is not in his constructive suggestions that he is most profitable or most entertaining; it is rather his remarks upon things as they are and his criticisms of men as they live that are stimulating. His characterizations of Roosevelt, Wilson, Bryan, and Tammany Hall are penetrating, and there are occasional vignettes that are worth while. For instance: "From Senator Lodge, for example, we do not expect any new perception of popular need. We know that probably his deepest sincerity is an attempt to reproduce the atmosphere of the Senate a hundred years ago. The manners of Mr. Lodge have that immobility which comes from too much gazing at bad statues of dead statesmen" (p. 6). For the sake of this kind of thing one can easily pardon his rather juvenile and cocksure pronouncements on such things as art, morals, and religion, with the feeling that he will probably outgrow most of them.

The Life of Sir Henry Vane the Younger. By John Willcock, M.A., D.D. With 13 portraits. London: St. Catherine Press.

The lives of those seventeenth-century Englishmen who for one reason or another emigrated to America and subsequently returned to participate in the great religious and constitutional struggles that were raging in their native land, are fraught with unusual interest for readers on both sides of the Atlantic. The most important of them was unquestionably the founder of Pennsylvania. Another, less known than he deserves to be, was Sir George Downing, a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1642, who went back to England during the Civil War to become Ambassador to the Netherlands under Cromwell and Charles II, and a stanch upholder of the doctrine of appropriation of supplies. The career of Sir Henry Vane the Younger, however, surpasses both of these in human interest and dramatic climax; indeed, it would be hard to find a more attractive subject in a period which teems with great men. Four formal lives of him had already been written in England and America when Mr. Willcock (who, by the way, is the author of three other recent seventeenth-century biographies) began the work which lies before us; but he has found enough new material, and been able to present old facts in sufficiently new lights, amply to justify him in his latest undertaking.

Born in 1613, the eldest son of a father prominent in the Parliaments and councils of the first two Stuart Kings, educated at Westminster and Oxford, Sir Henry Vane the Younger emigrated in 1635 to Massachusetts, in order to be able to enjoy the free exercise of his strong Puritan beliefs. Elected Governor of the colony, the year after his arrival, at the age of twenty-three, he was obliged to yield his office to Winthrop in 1637 on account of the unpopularity of Mrs. Hutchinson and the Antinomians, whose cause he had warmly espoused; and in August of that year he returned to England. He sat as a member of the Short and Long Parliaments, accidentally discovered and permitted Pym to copy the notes taken by his father on Strafford's famous speech at the fatal Council meeting of May 5, 1540, and thus furnished the evidence which ultimately was to send "Black Tom Tyrant" to the block; he was an ardent supporter of the "Root and Branch" bill, and gave his whole-hearted allegiance to the popular cause. An enthusiastic champion of liberty of conscience, he bitterly opposed the tyranny of the Presbyterian system, and until the year 1647 was one of the dearest and most intimate friends of Oliver Cromwell. His desire to reach some compromise which should save the King and settle religion on the basis of moderate episcopacy and toleration led, however, to a divergence between the two men, which became a permanent breach on the occasion of Cromwell's forcible dissolution of the Long Parliament in April, 1653, which Vane bitterly opposed. The scene enacted there is familiar to all students of English history.

Perhaps the most difficult question which confronts the biographer of a man like Vane is to decide how much general history of the period to include. Certainly, no one can complain that Mr. Willcock has neglected his background; some of his readers will probably feel that he has overdone it, especially as he is by no means uniformly accurate in his delineations of current events or constitutional problems; his statements about "tonnage and poundage" on p. 20 are a case in point. The somewhat wandering accounts of the early lives of Laud and Wentworth could also, in our opinion, have been omitted, or at least cut down. There is a misprint on page 9. Narragansett is not, as Mr. Willcock (p. 28) seems to think, the name of a river. These details, however, do not seriously diminish the value of Mr. Willcock's work. And it is gratifying to note that he has resisted the temptation to hero-worship (would that all the other biographers of Vane had done the same!), that he writes pleasingly and for the most part convincingly, and that he knows his subject sufficiently well to be entitled to speak with authority. His life of Vane is by far the best that has yet been produced.

The twenty-fifth edition of Baedeker's "Switzerland, and the Adjacent Portions of Italy, Savoy, and Tyrol" (Scribner) comes out at a time when the heavy travel to that country has closed for the year, but the book will be ready for the spring exodus and will need no recommendation.

The American Book Company, in conjunction with G. & C. Merriam Co., has brought out a new "Webster's Secondary-School Dictionary," which, as it is abridged from the "New International," has the stamp of authenticity and authority. It contains above 70,000 words and some 1,000 illustrations. It is sold at the low price of $1.50.

A new edition of "The Family" (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company), by Charles F. and Carrie F. Butler Thwing, has been issued. The first edition was published in 1885 and is widely and favorably known. The changes in this edition include a revision of the chapter on the teachings of Christ on the family, corrections of statistics respecting divorce, and a discussion of the probable effects on the family of possible changes in the direction of Socialism.

The new edition of Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell's "Labrador: the Country and the People" (Macmillan) is a reprint of the edition of 1909, with two additional chapters on "Animal Life in Labrador" and "Conservation and Exploration," and brief bibliographies. It is too bad that the original text has not been revised: the account of the present condition of the Moravian missions and the Eskimo, for example, needs recasting, and chapter ii, on travelled routes to Labrador, is quite out of date. The work of the Grenfell mission, also, has expanded a good deal since the book first appeared. In his new chapter on conservation and exploration, Dr. Grenfell makes an earnest plea for the scientific utilization of Labrador as a game preserve, a study of the fisheries with a view to their preservation, and the development of the mineral and timber resources of the country.

"The First Explorations of the Trans-Allegheny Region by the Virginians" (A. H. Clark), by C. W. Alvord and Lee Bidgood, is an edition of the sources relating to English exploration west of the mountains between 1650 and 1670. The chief sources are Bland's pamphlet on the "Discovery of New Britain begun in 1650," the "Discoveries of John Lederer begun in 1669," Clayton's "Transcript of the Journal of Robert Fallam," a letter of Abraham Wood relating the journey of Needham and Arthur, and Daniel Coxe's account of the activities of the English in the Mississippi valley in the seventeenth century. The editors provide an introduction of eighty-four pages, presenting in great detail all that is known of the expeditions and much biographical material of the men connected with them. The motives of the explorations were "Asiatic commerce, mines of gold and silver, and the fur trade." The material here published corrects the impression conveyed by Parkman and Winsor, that the French had the better claim to the West by discovery. On the contrary, "Englishmen were among the first to see the waters that flow westward and southward. They knew the region of the upper Ohio years before the French had any record of the river's course." These facts are well established, but a much briefer introduction would have answered every purpose. The belief of the editors that Wood, Batts, Fallam, and Needham are deserving of fame as well as Joliet, Marquette, and LaSalle, doubtless accounts for the length of the introduction. But there is one striking difference between the explorations of the former and those of the latter: the discoveries of the French were followed up by the establishment of trading posts and forts, while the discoveries of the English were without practical effect, so far as English occupation is concerned, for nearly half a century. It is difficult for historians to confer fame on men whose actions were little noted by their contemporaries.

"France" (Macmillan), by Cecil Headlam, is one of The Making of the Nations series. It is certainly difficult to write a good history of the French nation in 400 pages. Besides accurate knowledge, the author should have a firm grasp of the larger movements, the decisive tendencies; and the literary skill which is essential for bringing them into proper relation. Mr. Headlam has accurate knowledge, for the most part, but the narrative is little more than a concise, clear summary of facts, mainly political, in chronological sequence—a series of events presented on a dead level, without relief or relative emphasis. The author is probably better equipped for the earlier than for the later part of French history. At all events the least satisfactory part of the book is that which deals with the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The period from 1815 to 1870 is dispatched in fourteen pages, which is less space than is given to Philip IV and his three successors. Thirty-six pages are given to the ancien régime and the Revolution, neither of which is adequately presented, even allowing for the limitation of space. The reader will not understand very well why the king was executed, or what was the difference between Girondin and Jacobin, or what was the essential meaning of the Terror. It can scarcely be maintained without qualification that Voltaire was one of those who believed human nature to be naturally good, certainly not that the Constituante was mainly concerned with the agrarian revolution, or that it was dominated by the ideas of Rousseau. Montesquieu, not Rousseau, inspired the Deputies of the First Assembly.

Those who wish to form a first-hand impression of the character and work of Francisco Ferrer will welcome Joseph McCabe's translation of "The Origin and Ideals of the Modern School" (Putnam). The "Modern School," it should be noted, was the school established by Ferrer. The book was found among the papers restored to Ferrer's trustees. It was his only book, and, as Mr. McCabe says, it is a frank portrayal of the character of the man and a description of his aims.

The proceedings of the Second National Conference on Housing, held in Philadelphia last December, have been published in admirable form as Volume II of "Housing Problems in America." The first volume of that name, a year or so ago, signalized the auspicious beginning of a movement to bring together in one organization persons in all parts of the country who are thinking and working on the vital problems of housing. The second volume marks a gratifying advance in the number of those who assembled to participate in the Conference, and in the range and interest of the proceedings. Following an address by Mr. Bryce on "The Menace of Great Cities," the leading papers, ten in number, deal with sanitary inspection of lodgings, tenement and building laws, overcrowding and the lodger evil, the best types of workingmen's houses, the possibility of moving factories and the homes of workers to the outskirts of cities, garden cities, the financing of house-building projects, etc. Discussion of the papers and reports by delegates on what has been accomplished in their several communities occupy some 200 pages. The discussion is full of enthusiasm, suggestion, and practical experience.

Four years ago the Nation (September 9, 1909) noted the appearance of Prof. C. H. Grandgent's edition of the "Inferno" (Heath). A companion volume containing the "Purgatorio" was published in 1911. A third volume, the "Paradiso," and a large volume containing the entire "Divine Comedy" have now been issued simultaneously. The large volume is printed from the plates used for the smaller ones, and the three cantiche, in consequence, are separately paged. A few errors found in the separate issues of the "Inferno" and the "Purgatorio" are corrected in the complete form. The work thus finished is the first American annotated edition of the Italian text of "The Divine Comedy." The comment, appearing in footnotes and in arguments prefixed to the several cantos, is notable both for its thorough and alert scholarship and for its skilful adaptation, in material and in arrangement, to the needs of the American student. The open page gives the impression that the text's the thing, and the notes seem what they are, instead of presenting a formidable mass scholastic in proportions. The translations of difficult phrases are particularly good; they have something of the finality of the original. The mature reader will find, among many satisfactions, a style of delightful vigor and finish in the introductions and arguments. The book will stimulate American study of Dante both in quantity and in quality. In its importance and in its excellence this edition is worthy to rank with the Dante translations of Longfellow and Norton.

J. G. Robertson's "The Literature of Germany" (Holt) gives within a small compass an excellent connected narrative of the salient facts in the history of German literature from the earliest times down to the present day. It is a popular book and passes lightly over many things which in themselves might seem to deserve more than mention. Naturally, the Middle Ages receive only scant attention. The period of the Reformation, however, is made to appear more barren of real literature than it was. The Age of Classic Achievement is most fully and adequately treated. Romanticism does not fare so well, and we should have expected such a figure as Heinrich von Kleist to stand out much more prominently. The multifarious nineteenth century is, on the whole, presented in orderly and skilful fashion. We may question Professor Robertson's judgment in the matter of omissions, but seldom in the matter of evaluation or the indication of relationships. The little book is interestingly written and is of a kind to inspire respect for both subject and author.

The career of Sigma Xi is so closely identified with the development of scientific study in America that its "Quarter Century History and Record, 1886-1911," compiled by the Secretary, Henry Baldwin Ward, and published by the University of Illinois, is a valuable document in the history of education. It is strange that, with the society's rapid growth in scope and dignity, embracing every section but the South, this is the first formal account of its activities to be published, and its first catalogue since 1893. It numbered, in 1911, twenty-eight active chapters, with 4,498 members distributed through all the important colleges and every scientific profession; and its influence on undergraduate scholarship is held second only to that of Phi Beta Kappa, founded more than a hundred years earlier:

> By stamping as the primary factor in scientific pursuits the power to investigate, Sigma Xi has laid the emphasis on the general good, and freed itself from self-centred tendencies. Locally it has often led in the discussion of educational values; and it has put on an equal basis with research in pure science that pursuit of applied science which has prolonged human life and made it in a thousand ways worth living. The emphasis thus laid upon service is a worthy contribution to national advancement.

Besides historical matter connected with Sigma Xi, which the reader must wish had been amplified, the publication contains statistical tables, lists of members by chapters, a general name-index, a geographical name-index, lists of officers, and the constitution and by-laws. The only illustrations are reproductions of early programmes and minute-sheets. The task of compilation was obviously onerous, and the secretary records that chapter negligence complicated the difficulty of procuring documentary materials, and at times made absolute accuracy impossible.

Henry Billings Brown, formerly Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, died last Thursday at the age of seventy-seven. He was born in South Lee, Mass. He was appointed Federal Judge for the Eastern District of Michigan by President Grant, and was raised to the Supreme Court in 1890, retiring in 1906. He was the compiler of "Brown's Admiralty Reports."

Eugene Lemoine Didier has just died in Baltimore at the age of seventy-five. He was educated at Loyola College. He entered on a commercial career, but gave it up in 1867 to accept a place as editor of Southern Society, a weekly periodical. Later he was appointed Deputy Marshal of the United States Supreme Court at Baltimore. He was the author of "Life of Edgar Allan Poe," "Life and Letters of Madame Bonaparte," "Primer of Criticism," and "The Political Adventures of James G. Blaine."

William Carew Hazlitt, man of letters, bibliographer, and numismatist, died on Monday in London. He was the son of the late Registrar Hazlitt, of the Court of Bankruptcy, and grandson of William Hazlitt, essayist. He was born in London in 1834 and was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School. He studied civil engineering under George and Sir John Rennie, but gave up that profession for literature and archæology. Among publications by Mr. Hazlitt were: "The Venetian Republic," "Bibliographical Collections and Notes," "The Livery Companies of London," "Tenures of Land and Customs of Manors," and "Four Generations of a Literary Family."

We find reported the death, at Lausanne, of Mlle. Favre, who wrote under the well-known name of "Pierre de Coulevain." Her novels, which have been reviewed so recently that they need not be named here, dealt often with English and American matters.

Mind and Health. With an Examination of Some Systems of Divine Healing. By Edward E. Weaver, Ph.D., Sometime Fellow in Clark University. With an Introduction by G. Stanley Hall, Ph.D., LL.D., President of Clark University. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2 net.

Readers of this very interesting book, if by chance they have watched the development of psychologists, and more particularly of those of the American brand, for the past few decades, will find fresh and entertaining evidence of the cool readiness with which these persons take any knowledge to be in their own special field when they choose to care for it.

It is with psychotherapy that Dr. Weaver wishes to deal, its development and some aspects of its application. He devotes an introductory chapter to a short and somewhat bare historical outline which starts with Mesmer. Earlier forebears of the psychotherapeutist are briefly mentioned, but with little or no consideration of their relative importance. As an outline the account is rather good, but the reader would never dream that certain periods had been times of most dramatic and passionate interest or that from time to time science and society were deeply agitated by some of the questions that arose, questions that now cause mere ripples on the surface of opinion. Concerning Mesmer and his immediate succession Dr. Weaver quite overlooks the fact that the general question of electricity and presently the particular question of animal electricity, as the term was then used, were, historically, most intimately connected with the frame of mind that made mesmerism possible. And when the reader to whom the subject is new comes to the modern period, he will hardly see the significance of the Nancy school. Liébeault, although he did not appear in print until 1866, had there begun as early as 1860 to show that by simple suggestion sleep may be induced, or something very like sleep, and also that certain symptoms of disease may be removed; but for years he was neglected and even despised by the faculty of the University and by the other physicians of the town. It was not until 1882, years after Charcot's trumpet from the Salpêtrière had awakened popular and scientific interest in a totally different conception of the questions involved, that Bernheim of Nancy began to pay attention to the healing which for many years had been done unheeded and almost at his very door, and became the prophet of Liébeault. Through Bernheim also, Liégeois and Beaunis were led to take an interest in these studies, and thus after a long delay Liébeault at last came to his own. And again concerning the last and brightest offspring of psychotherapy, psycho-analysis, it may be said that Breuer, although credited with the parentage, hardly gets quite full credit for his share in the upbringing of the child, most of it being given to Freud; but in this neglect of Breuer Dr. Weaver has plenty of company. On the other hand, one may commend the care that he takes to give just and full recognition of the influence of Quimby, without whom Mrs. Eddy and some others would have been impossible.

The next chapter is devoted to theories of mind that form a basis for psychotherapeutics. It cannot be said that a very deep plunge is made here, but the discussion is illuminating and probably sufficient for the readers whom the author wishes to reach. After a brief consideration of the three theories characterized as those of dissociation, of a subliminal self, and of the supra-mental, the first (that of modification or dissociation) is accepted as giving the best foundation, but with the express limitation that the theory must not be interpreted too rigidly. Then follow chapters on what are called the principles of psychotherapy, being an account of the armentarium and technique. Here there is a lack of definiteness and the presence of much confusing quotation where condensation and clean-cut statement are much to be desired. If the reader is looking for practical instruction he will look in vain, as the pages on psycho-analysis (pp. 110, 180 seq.) abundantly show.

Thus far it may seem that the author is seeking good psychological foundations to aid in the development of psychotherapy as a part of medicine, but the rest of the book makes clear that his real interest lies in its usefulness in the work of the church. After some explanation and much citation concerning reality, and particularly concerning religious reality and its share in some types of healing, Dr. Weaver goes on to consider a few of the religious systems of mental healing: Christian Science, the Emmanuel Movement, Divine Healing as exhibited in Dowieism and in the Christian Alliance of Simpson. To each of these systems is given considerable space for the presentation of the essential doctrines and a discussion of their merits and defects, a discussion that seems everywhere not only instructive, but also fair and just. Another chapter is devoted to metaphysical healing, Whipple's "Mental Healing" being taken as the representative of the numerous cults of "new thought." This system seems to appeal to him as the most sober and sanest of the group. Dr. Weaver evidently thinks that Whipple is on the right track, although he has far too much speculation and too little clearness "in his treatment of spiritual intelligence and its relations to consciousness and conceptual thinking." There is apparently just enough of truth in Whipple's metaphysical ideas of psychotherapy to justify the wish that they might be brought out more clearly and receive a surer foundation.

The last three chapters deal with a valid religious system of healing. Of this it is demanded that it be supremely good, recognize æsthetic values, and have in view the truth values; and it will misconceive the goal if it break away from scientific methods. Its aim must be to learn and apply psychotherapeutic principles, but with the recognition of God as the source of power, since to know aright this ultimate reality is to open the channels by which order and harmony may be brought to man's being. Such a power of healing must be exercised by ministers of religion, and this will involve a marked change in theological education with the broadening of the function of the religious teacher. The scope of the system as here set forth, and this is perhaps the crux of the whole book, seems to lie in the fact that an evident increase of ills calls for psychotherapy; in the assurance of greater power thus to be given to the well; in the universality of its message; and finally in the emphasis which will be laid on prophylaxis. There are also practical suggestions as to the part which the church as a body may play by improvement of its service, whose value is easily and now all too frequently underrated, by actively seeking the help of the minister, and by co-operation with all man-saving agencies.

This condensation of the ideas of the author may strike the reader as vague, but the original statement along with an undeniable grandeur of purpose is also vague. Here, as elsewhere in the book, Dr. Weaver evidently has no clear notion as to what the physician is and what he tries to do, and at best a very hazy conception of the danger of doing harm which a religious teacher endeavoring to practice psychotherapy must run. This comes out clearly enough also in his allusions to prophylaxis, with the particular stress on alcohol and venereal diseases, and in statements like this (p. 381): "Epidemics will lose their power. Contagious diseases will be effectually checked, or at least will be robbed of their malignancy"—all this and more as the result of the adoption of psychotherapy in a valid religious system of healing. It looks as though one might ride the psychotherapeutic steed with too free a rein, and there is also the much more serious danger that some readers may think him a mere hobby-horse, fit only for the wood-pile.

Originally begun as a dissertation, the book has many of the earmarks of its origin and of a development in which quotations and cards of reference seem to have swamped the writer at certain points. Its completed form would be much improved by the omission of many quotations or some form of marked concentration. The proofreading, especially with reference to umlauts and accents, leaves much to be desired, and a more careful system in the use of the names and titles of authors would improve the typography. The bibliography has evidently been collected with some industry; it has nearly three hundred titles. These are grouped in six sections and a number of subdivisions, an arrangement which causes much confusion if the reader seek any particular book, for neither the index of names nor that of subjects gives a clue. The basis for the selection of the books to be included is not evident, and the list is hardly as fundamental and exhaustive as its number would suggest.

The study of insects as a hobby is much more widespread in Europe than in this country, as is attested by the large number of collectors' guides and handbooks which there find ready sale. The most recent of these is A. G. Scorer's "Entomologist's Log-Book" (Dutton), which, as its sub-title indicates, is a "dictionary of the life-histories and food plants of the British Macro-lepidoptera." In a single alphabetical arrangement are the host plants, and genera and species of the larger moths and butterflies. By an excellent arrangement there are recorded the more salient points regarding the life histories, time of appearance, habits, etc., of the common British species, while interleaving provides for private notes. The volume will be of much service to English amateurs, but of course can be merely suggestive to students elsewhere.

Illustrated books about the animal world, more or less valuable and variously arranged, have poured from the press since photography and mechanical engraving have made printed pictures cheap and excellent, but the plant-world has been far less favored. Two English botanists, Messrs A. E. Knight and Edward Step, F.L.S., have entered this field in their "Popular Botany" (Holt, 2 vols.), offering an encyclopædic book well worth having for its illustrations if for nothing else. These number no less than 721, besides 18 colored plates; and most of them are from unusually good photographs of living plants, trees, growing fruits, etc. These are supplemented by many excellent drawings of structural details, making clear the anatomy and physiology of representative species or groups, and their specific adaptations. While the text is mainly descriptive of typical or interesting plants in various parts of the world, the general arrangement of the matter is botanical, in the sense that the chapters follow the natural course of plant development from seed to fruitage, and the various pictures and descriptions are of illustrative examples. Thus the attentive reader learns as he proceeds the composition of plants, how they obtain food, of what it consists, and how it is assimilated; the characteristics of plant-growth; the adaptations of plants to their environment, how they protect themselves against adversity, and so on. It is evident that the authors have read widely in their field, and the many citations made from the writings of botanists and scientific travellers add much to the value as well as to the readability of the volumes; yet America seems to have hardly a fair share of attention. On the whole, the work may be recommended, especially to school libraries.

The small book "On Alcoholism, its Clinical Aspects and Treatment" (Blakiston), by Dr. Francis Hare, is based largely on the author's somewhat extended experience as superintendent of the Norwood Sanatorium in Kent (England), a private institution for the treatment of alcoholism and drug habits. It is not intended primarily for the lay reader, and does not expound a "cure" as that term is commonly understood; nor are the methods of treatment such that any but medical men may safely use them. Dr. Hare was for a number of years in general hospital practice in the Colonies before taking up this special line of work. He is no fanatic regarding alcohol and has many rational views concerning its harmful action. His discussion of the problems belonging to the clinical side of alcoholism, particularly of true and pseudo-dipsomania and of alcoholic intolerance as the source of mania à potu, carefully to be distinguished from delirium tremens, may be commended to all who care to look into these questions.

The Cambridge University Press (Putnam) has been issuing the collected papers of a number of British physicists. Under the editorship of Sir Joseph Larmor, secretary of the Royal Society, the work of Fitzgerald and Sir George Stokes has been made accessible, and now "The Papers in Physics and Engineering" of Prof. James Thomson has been added. There is hardly any work more useful to science than thus to collect and publish the papers of the men who have contributed anything of permanent value, and it should continue until all such are included. The case of James Thomson is an illustration. While he will not rank as a first-rate physicist, yet he discovered one law of fundamental importance, the change of the freezing point with pressure, and in a number of his other papers there are suggestions which have since been developed by others.

Thomson's scientific papers are classified under topics, the larger number of which relate to engineering problems. Of these, his work on pumps and the flow of fluids is the most important. In pure physics, besides the fundamental discovery already mentioned, which, by the way, was published when the author was only twenty-seven years old, there are important papers relating to fluid motion, air currents, and the physical laws of geology. The volume also contains a biographical sketch, which dwells particularly on Thomson's share in the interesting and beautiful family life with which we have already become acquainted in the biographies of his illustrious brother, Lord Kelvin. The excellence of Thomson's English style should also be noted. It is singularly clear and exact. In fact, one of his most characteristic traits was his scrupulous conscientiousness in endeavoring to impart to others in the least ambiguous language attainable the exact ideas he desired to convey. As a result, he apparently could not always find a word suited to his purpose, and therefore introduced many new scientific terms, some of which are now well established. This trait made him reluctant to express an opinion until he was certain of it, and probably accounts for a smaller amount of published work than might have been expected from one who was so constantly occupied with scientific problems. The work of editing is, as always with Sir Joseph Larmor, most unobtrusive and careful, and the press-work of the book is above reproach.

For school teachers the new small book on "School Hygiene" (Macmillan) in Monroe's Brief Course Series in Education may be much commended. It is the work of Fletcher B. Dresslar, who bears the cumbersome title of a specialist in school hygiene and school sanitation of the United States Bureau of Education. Pretty much every topic that bears directly on the health of children in school is touched upon, in so far as it comes under the control of the teacher. The discussion is in the main full, informing, and suggestive, although somewhat uneven. Members of school boards and committees would derive much benefit from a perusal of the book, and not least from a consideration of the duties of good janitors—men little lower than the angels.

Lucien Augustus Walt, professor emeritus at Cornell University, died Saturday at Clifton Springs. He was sixty-seven years old. He was born at Highgate, Vt., and shortly after his graduation at Harvard in 1870 he became assistant professor of mathematics at Cornell. He rose to the head of the department of mathematics in 1895, serving in that capacity until 1910. He founded the Cascadilla Preparatory School. Professor Walt served as United States Consul at Athens in 1873.

Drama

FILTH ON THE STAGE.

No other word will describe it. The theatrical season is just getting under way, and already the standards of ordinary decency and of honest art have been outraged by the mercenary playwright and producer. The success of the "crook play" of former seasons has convinced the traffickers of the theatre that a market exists for stronger meat than they have hitherto ventured to purvey. They have evidently set out to satisfy the demand, and we are now witnessing a competitive struggle in the theatre, tending towards the survival of the nastiest. Under the guise of contributions towards the study of the social evil, plays have been thrown on the stage which are abominable in their theme and still more abominable in their intention.

None of the factors that serve to excuse, partially or totally, the introduction into art of what is ugly or revolting enter into the present case. Not all of us admit that high purpose or sincerity is sufficient excuse for any treatment of any theme that the artist may feel impelled to undertake; but a great many do hold that opinion. Not all of us admit that the claims of art, for its own sake, absolve its practitioners from the established restraints of decency and the recognized laws of beauty; yet there are a great many people who do say so. But what question is there, in the present invasion of the stage by the cesspool exploiters, of either high purpose and sincerity or high art? Brieux and Shaw, and Gorky before them, have the standing of belligerents against society. They have made it their mission to instruct or shock into self-examination the supporters of a social order whose basic ideas they detest or pity. Whatever may be said about the sincerity of one who seems the least sincere of these leaders of revolt—Bernard Shaw—the fact remains that well through middle age he did not commit violence upon the public for profit. For this reason there is a certain difference between the significance of a production like "Mrs. Warren's Profession," and the foul material that is shovelled on the stage to-day by the native dramatists. The thing is so obviously done for profit and so obviously done in disregard both of the truth of life and the truth of art. What we have is neither satire as with Shaw, nor exhortation as with Brieux, nor wild wrath as with Gorky, nor the profound sense of the pity and terror of life as with Flaubert. It is just a trafficking in filth.

In this cold-blooded, almost automatic, response to the appeal, or supposed appeal, of the box-office, consists the main offence. If the promise of profit to-day were brighter for plays like "'Way Down East," these craftsmen would be turning out plays of homely pathos and platitude. If the outlook seemed to be bright for the drama of Big Business and politics, they would be lashing out at Wall Street. You are convinced that if public attention should centre next year upon the aeroplane or the model village, they will be producing aeroplane and commuter plays next year. Is this lack of conscience or lack of understanding? Are these men under the impression that putting the brothel on the stage has no worse consequences than putting a church-wedding on the stage? One is almost tempted to believe that ignorance is at the bottom of it all; that the men who are now dramatizing the reports of the vice commissions are not aware of the consequences of what they are doing. "White slaves" and the social evil are now in the air, and what is in the air is apparently fit for dramatic exploitation. The outcast of the streets is a novelty, just as at one time princesses of Zenda were a novelty; and the irresistible law of expediency makes the playwright forget what can be decently done and what must in decency be let alone. After all, behind the theatrical man who is exploiting filth for mercenary ends, we may not be wrong in laying the blame to no small degree on those sensational reformers and giddy humanitarians who, working in willing or unwilling conjunction with the yellow press, are accustoming thoughtless minds to the contemplation of vice in all its hideous forms, and deadening the right sensibility of the public while attempting to awaken it.

Plays of Old Japan: The Nō. By Marie C. Stopes. Together with translations of the dramas by M. C. Stopes and Joji Sakurai. Illustrated. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.75 net.

This charming little volume embodies the hard "task of years" of a brilliant Englishwoman. It is remarkable enough that a student of palæobotany, for such is Mrs. Stopes-Gates, should develop literary powers of a high class; it is altogether extraordinary that she should, as she has done, go deeply into the most difficult branch of the difficult literature of an old Oriental nation, and succeed in interpreting to the English-reading public its spirit and beauty.

The Nō pieces, of which four are here presented in English, were products of the simple literary taste of the warrior class of Japan in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. They are crude dramatizations of old legends, embellished with numerous allusions to ancient literature and traditions well known at that time; in spirit, the Nō plays are, one and all, thoroughly imbued with the Buddhist idea of the transitoriness of the world. Both the language and the thought are already so remote from the present generation of Japanese that, though the singing of the Nō is a fashion of the day among certain classes, commentaries are needed to elucidate many obscure points. The place the Nō occupies in the literary history of Japan is highly important; and, from a broader point of view, these plays are not without interest in the history of the world's literature—for their apparent resemblance to Greek dramas, at least in their use of choruses, and, above all, for their poetic presentation, sometimes in a highly dramatic fashion, of the elemental, universal pathos of this fleeting life of ours, and of the profound human desire to rise into the spiritual region where is neither birth nor death—which is eternity.

Our author manifests a lively appreciation of these points; she has never lost sight of them throughout her work of translation, which must have been arduous in the extreme. The validity of her general principle regarding translation, namely, to be faithful to the original sense, but not to be needlessly literal and unidiomatic, would seem to depend entirely on the personal success of the translator. In the present instance, the practice has justified the idea. It seems perfectly safe to explain the Nō to the Occidental reader through the medium of these translations. Such occasional slips as may be noticed, as, for example, mō-shū (delusion), on page 48, which is taken for mō-zhū (wild beast), are few and relatively unimportant. The only serious fault we have found arises from the fact that the various tendencies of Buddhist thought that are typified in the original plays—the Tendai, or Zen, of the "Maiden's Tomb"; the faith that centred about the resolves and acts of Avalokitesvara as expounded in the Saddharma-pundarika, of "Tamura"; and the dependence on the saving power of Amita-Budhha of the Pure Land of the West, of "Sumida River"—are not characterized by the translator with sufficient diversity. As a result, the chanting of the sutra (pp. 48, 49, 73), the religious care of the departed (p. 69), and the adoration of Amita (p. 78, etc.), are alike translated as "prayers."

The translations are preceded by an interestingly written introduction on the nature of the Nō and its performance on the stage. We venture to think that, had Mrs. Stopes-Gates read even Professor Tsubouchi's brief history of the Nō in "Fifty Years of New Japan," edited by Count S. Okuma (II, 378-380), her own account would have been made clearer without occupying any additional space.

Feminine touches of the translator are frequently visible (see, e. g., pp. 18, 38, and note 48 on p. 102), and add greatly to the charm of the work. The illustrations are by the Japanese artist Kōgyo, who has also adorned Mr. Wada's tales of the Nō in Japanese recently published in two volumes.

The Baconian business is of the stuff selected by the dam of all the nightmares for the construction of the ancestral nest. A late example is Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence's discovery that a "starre-ypointed pyramid," found instead of the grammatically less correct "starre-ypointing" in one copy of Milton's famous epitaph, is really a beacon (pronounced Bacon, as it may have been in Elizabeth's day). Puzzles and puns we have always with us—and devotees of the cryptogram who are happily unconcerned with the facts of literary history. It is not to such that Mr. J. M. Robertson addresses his stout volume, "The Baconian Heresy" (Dutton). Mr. Greenwood and Dr. Theobald and the like are the men he attacks, and although they doubtless will remain eloquently unconvinced, the book should be of considerable service to the large class whom Mark Twain called "Brontosaurians"; honest men enough, not over learned in the ways of Elizabethan literature, who allow themselves to be puzzled by the factitious difficulties about Shakspere the player and Shakespeare the pseudonym. There are many such people, and to them Mr. Robertson's confutation does a great kindness in making the difficulties of the Baconian heresy abundantly plain. The matter of the legal acquirements, for example, possessed by the author of the plays has been a stumbling-block to many; even Andrew Lang expressed himself entirely at a loss on the point, and Mark Twain, following his inspirer, Mr. Greenwood, is willing to let his whole case stand or fall by the question of Shakespeare's limitless familiarity with the law. But it is easy for Mr. Robertson to demonstrate, though the assembling of the data cost some patience, that Shakespeare was on the whole rather less given than many of his contemporaries to adorning his language with legalisms; it was an Elizabethan fashion, and Shakespeare, by being in it, presents no peculiarity calling for an explanation, least of all the explanation thrust upon a credulous world by Lord Campbell, and supported, unhappily, by the facile guesses of some Shakespearean scholars, that he was a lawyer.

Again, the myth of Shakespeare's classical attainments, which rests on the blankest ignorance of the kind of literature accessible to the sixteenth-century reader, likewise fails utterly to stand the test of a comparative method. With undiminished vigor, however, Mr. Robertson continues to flog the dead corpse of heresy, showing the folly of argument from coincidence of phrase between Shakespeare and Bacon, and the world-wide contrast in their intellectual interests, their lives and personalities. Even the much vexed problem of the second-best bed is carefully discussed. Altogether the author is justified of his pains, disproportionate as they sometimes seem to the importance of the question involved, in the production of a book which renders further argument supererogatory. If after reading it the wayfaring man is still uncertain of his course, he may in all conscience be abandoned to his folly. Incidentally, the book contains some interesting critical asides, such as the examination of Shakespeare's prose style, which concludes that Chaucer was the greater master of the two.

Music

The Century Opera Weekly has made its appearance. Its 32-48 pages are to include not only the current repertory of the Century Opera Company, but a number of magazine features, besides news of conservatories, churches, and musical clubs. The first issue contains articles on "The American Girl in Grand Opera," "The Movement for Popular Opera in New York," "The Future of Music and the Music of the Future," "Russian Opera and Ballet in London," "Preparing for an Operatic Career." The writer of the first-named article makes the astounding statement that "America has turned out not only some but a majority of the greater prima donnas of the world."

Is the music teacher doomed? The opinion is gaining ground that he will be displaced by the phonograph, which shows every student how the great songs are sung by the great artists. Mr. Edison has phonographs which do for the ear what a microscope does for the eye, exaggerating everything, including the faults, which it is thus easier to correct. Hans von Bülow used to caricature the faults of his pupils for this purpose. His services were not without value in other respects; and perhaps some other teachers may survive in the struggle with the all-recording phonograph. One might say that teachers are needed to impart to pupils the art of interpretation. This art, however, cannot be taught, according to Liszt, who, nevertheless, taught it, and successfully, too. The world is full of paradoxes and contradictions!

The Pope's favorite among Italian composers of the period seems to be Don Lorenzo Perosi. Heretofore Perosi has been known chiefly by his oratorios, one of which made its way across the Atlantic; but it did not set the Hudson River on fire. Italian journals now announce that he is at work on an opera—not a "sacred opera," like some of Rubinstein's, but a real opera, with a worldly text. What is more, the libretto of this opera has been submitted to the Pope, who has approved of it. The opera is likely to be produced before the end of the season. Perosi was appointed director of the Sistine Chapel in 1898. The journalists, who refer to his operatic venture as something new and surprising, seem to be unaware of the fact that he composed a real opera, "Romeo and Juliet," some years ago. Of his masses the Pope is apparently fond, for there are twenty-five of them.

Is there such a thing as specifically and unmistakably Jewish music? Oscar Bie puts this question in an article written for the Konzert Taschenbuch, and translated by Jacques Mayer for the Hebrew Standard. After examining the peculiarities of Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Halévy, Offenbach, and Mahler (with a few words on the doubtful cases of Bizet and Wagner), he comes to the conclusion that there is no general or always conclusive characteristic. The Jews "have never created their own musical speech." Their creativeness is "somewhat greater in music than in poetry."

The operetta market is improving in Berlin. After a notable decline in the past few years, the present season promises an unusual number of novelties. The composers responsible for them are Edgar Istel, H. von Vojacek, Friedrich Bermann, W. W. Götze, Robert Leonard, Friedrich von Thul, K. F. Adolfi, Rudolf Baron, etc.

Philip Hale expresses the wish in the New Music Review that some one who has the patience and the critical acumen of Mr. O. G. Sonneck would make a collection of the popular songs of this country. "There are collections of Foster's songs; there is a volume of the more characteristic songs of Harrigan and Hart, with music by Dave Braham, but there is no anthology beginning with the Revolution." The collection might include some of the psalm tunes which in New England homes were folk-songs, and the patriotic songs of 1812. The nearest approach we have to real folk-songs are the melodies of Stephen Foster, the best of which would, of course, have to be included. Nor would it do to overlook some of the songs sung by Christy's Minstrels, the Virginia Minstrels, and Wood's Minstrels.

Art

A Short Critical History of Architecture. By H. Heathcote Statham, Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

If the English-speaking public is not thirsting for instruction in the history of architecture, there are evidently those who believe that it ought to be thirsting, and will thirst, and who are ready to provide the instruction in good season for the expected demand. The house of Scribners have imported from the Batsford Press in London a new one-volume history of architecture by the author of "Architecture for General Readers," published some twenty years since; of "Modern Architecture" (1895), and of other works. The new history is a stout octavo of 544 pages of historical text with 583 illustrations of a high average of excellence, and is in the main a trustworthy, intelligent, and (with occasional lapses) a well-written compendium. The general arrangement is along epochal and stylistic lines; the geographical and national divisions are minimized. This works well for the classical and Byzantine developments, but is sometimes confusing in the matter of the various provincial and national schools of the mediæval, Renaissance, and Moslem developments. The curious running page-headings are distracting rather than helpful; on the other hand, the chronological tables appended to each section are valuable aids.

Apart from the confusing association of works of widely scattered schools in the accounts of given periods, the historical matter is generally sound and accurate, though occasional slips may be noted, such as making the Hyksos period in Egypt last 500 years ("as long as the time from William the Conqueror to Elizabeth"), and dating the church of San Ambrogio at Milan, as a whole, in the twelfth century; but these are few and unimportant. The analysis and criticism of styles and buildings are generally fair. Roman architecture, so often disparaged in other books, is treated with discriminating praise and blame —the latter not wholly free from the narrow prejudices which seem to have become traditional among English and American writers in speaking of the orders, and especially of the arcaded order, which Mr. Statham thinks "has left a long legacy of falsehood to architecture." Mr. Statham admires the Pantheon at Rome, but is so sure that he could have designed it better that he offers his own design in evidence (p. 153). The serene self-confidence which this reveals appears also in the summary way in which he dismisses the controversy over the question of the stage in the Greek theatre. Although the best Hellenists and students of dramatics are still divided over it, it presents no difficulties for this author, who pronounces a final verdict ex cathedrâ against Dörpfeld and "the Americans," and in favor of the stage. So on page 158 he disposes of the mystery of the immense blocks in the podium of the Sun Temple at Baalbec; they were merely the advertisement of an enterprising quarryman!

The account of the mediæval styles, in spite of its confused arrangement, is excellent, and there is none of that "patriotic" effort sometimes found in English books to minimize the French achievements and influence and unduly to exalt the English contributions to the development of Gothic architecture. The Renaissance architects are acquitted of the charge of being mere copyists, and the Renaissance work of Germany and Spain is fairly treated, in contrast to its entire omission from the much larger treatise of Professor Simpson.

Of Americans and their art Mr. Statham has little good to say. In footnotes and obiter dicta he repeatedly girds at them, especially at their writers and professors, with sarcastic asperity. The Capitol at Washington is "only an effort at sublimity in cement" (sic); and our commercial buildings "are mostly mere masses of commonplace architecture run up with no purpose but money-making." The ultra-commercial spirit, he declares, began in America. Yet he has to confess that American architecture at present "takes a very high place indeed," especially in our public buildings; and as "it is superior to that of either Germany or England," he may be forgiven his cement Capitol and his slaps at the professors.

A glossary and a very full index occupy the last forty pages of the volume.

Curtis & Cameron announce the early publication of Mr. Abbey's last work, "The Reading of the Declaration of Independence," a mural decoration for the Pennsylvania State Capitol at Harrisburg.

Okakura Kakuzo, the distinguished Japanese art critic, died at Tokio September 4 at the age of fifty-one. After his graduation from the University of Tokio, in 1886, he was appointed in the Ministry of Education in charge of music affairs. Later he was a member of a commission to study Western arts and crafts with regard to possible adoption of the Western style by Japan. The commission recommended that Japan should continue in her own artistic traditions. To conserve these the Government founded a national school, the Bijitsu Gakko, and for eleven years Okakura served as its head. Meanwhile he worked with the Archæological Commission to preserve the temple treasures, the movement being largely due to his initiative, and became director of the allied Imperial Museum of Tokio, Kioto, and Nara. Through the growing popularity of European ideals in Japan, his position as director of the art school became impossible. After a vain attempt to combine the foreign with the native courses, he resigned. With him seceded the greater part of the teachers and many of the students to form a new school, the famous and successful Nippon Bijutsuin. For many years Okakura travelled in China, India, Europe, and America, constantly observant of all the arts. His grave and impressive figure clothed in the rich and sober robes of a Samurai was an occasional and welcome apparition in the artistic circles of New York and Boston, where he won friends and admirers. Though singularly reticent on all matters of merely personal concern, he was a brilliant talker and lecturer, and came to write the English language with force and grace. "Ideals of the East" and "The Book of Tea" are his most read books. For many years he had helped the Boston Museum as an occasional adviser, and it was but a strengthening of this relation when in 1910 he was chosen as curator of Far-Eastern art. He set himself to building up the collections in the field of primitive Chinese painting and sculpture. He was a steadfast advocate of the selective principle of museum exhibition, believing that only the finer objects should be displayed to the public and that exhibits of merely archæological interest should be reserved for students. In the Far-Eastern galleries of the Museum he set an example of beautiful and instructive installation along these selective lines. With fairly Samural self-control, Okakura combined extraordinary vigor and fervor of the mind, with great dignity and charm of manner. In a true sense he was an exemplar of the finest traditions of his land, a nationalist and yet a cosmopolitan—a choice and potent personality the like of which our times may hardly produce again.

THE QUESTION OF RAILWAY RATES

In October the Interstate Commerce Commission will hear the formal application of the Eastern railways for permission to increase their freight rates. Some fifty roads in the territory lying north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River are concerned in this application, and the magnitude of the interests involved may be gathered from the fact that the annual freight revenues of these roads now aggregate at least a billion dollars. The advance is sought on all classes of freight, commodities as well as classified freight, and a uniform increase of 5 per cent. is desired. It is absolutely within the power of the Commission to grant or refuse the application; moreover, under the existing law, it is incumbent on the carrier desiring to increase a given rate to show that the proposed new rate is "reasonable." Consequently, it devolves upon the Eastern railways to show the "reasonableness" of the 5 per cent. increase. Elaborate preparations are now making, looking to this, and it is fair to assume that the Commission will have before it a great mass of testimony thoroughly covering the essential points at issue.

There is, however, an abiding and fundamental difficulty in this matter of railway rates, escape from which is apparently impossible, unless, by means of additional court decisions on matters of broad principle, the present "twilight zone" be more brightly illuminated than it is now. This "twilight zone" was demarcated some sixteen years ago by the Supreme Court of the United States in the famous Nebraska "maximum rate" case, known to lawyers as "Smyth vs. Ames." The decision was handed down by Judge Harlan and has long been classic. It laid down two sets of criteria as to "reasonableness" of rates, one concerned with and designed to protect the carrier, the other concerned with and designed to protect the shipper. It said briefly that the carrier was entitled to a fair return on the value of the property used in public service, and that the shipper was entitled to be charged no more than the service was reasonably worth. In the case of the carrier, the object was to prevent confiscation, and in the case of the shipper the object was to prevent exploitation. The former established a minimum and the latter a maximum, and between the two was the "twilight zone." Presumably, the "reasonable rate" could be found in given cases somewhere in this zone. The difficulty, however, has been to find it.

The whole trend of thought since this case was decided has been towards elimination of this "twilight zone" by the simple process of recognizing but one set of criteria, and those the criteria affecting the carrier. It is not too much to say that the public mind has proceeded on the basis that the Court, when it said that the carrier was entitled to a fair return on value of property in service, really meant that it was entitled to no more than this. The language of the Interstate Commission in many decisions certainly bears this construction, and it has come to be regarded as a more or less settled principle. In other words, where no confiscation can be shown by the carrier the reasonableness of the rate is considered proven.

Now, the fundamental difficulty above alluded to arises from precisely this thing, viz., elimination of the criteria affecting the shipper. For it can safely be said that the entire structure of rates involved in the present case has grown up under a process of competition governed originally and at all times guided by factors having nothing whatever to do with the carriers' position and having everything to do with that of the shippers. It being simply impossible for a carrier to determine accurately in advance what profit it can make on a given article or commodity carried at a given rate, the rates were made solely with reference to moving the tonnage; that is, were made by consideration of the shipper's capacity and necessities. A railway could determine that less than a certain rate would not give it the actual cost of hauling the freight without taking into account overhead charges of all kinds, and it could determine that more than a certain rate would not move the tonnage at all. Further than this it could not go; consequently, the rates were made somewhere between these two limits, and competition gradually stereotyped them—in classification territory at least—at a level where they have remained unchanged for twenty-five years. It is these rates which are now to be reviewed in the light of the carriers' necessities. There is no present complaint on the shippers' part as to the existing schedules—no general complaint, that is—and apparently the question will have to be answered solely on the decision whether or not the carriers need more revenues because the present return is not a "fair" return.

Obviously, a scientific solution is impossible under the circumstances, unless it be laid down as a principle that the rule which has governed all rate-making from time immemorial—"that which the traffic can properly bear"—is to be discarded, and unless it further be laid down as a principle that a carrier is to be limited to a fair return on value of property used in public service—in other words, that what Judge Harlan clearly meant as a minimum is hereafter to be regarded as the maximum. And, if this principle be adopted, there at once arises a practical difficulty, simple enough, but of great importance, which is that private capital cannot possibly be obtained for the public service upon any such conditions, and the next inevitable step is public ownership and operation.

It will be well if, at some stage of this dispute, some one will raise the question as to what Judge Harlan meant in "Smyth vs. Ames" by the phrase "what the service is reasonably worth," and get it before the Interstate Commerce Commission for discussion. For this is really the crux of the whole matter at the present stage. If there be such a thing at all as "reasonable worth of service," there must be criteria of this "worth" which are surely part of the matter now up for investigation and settlement.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE, AN OBSOLETE SHIBBOLETH

By HIRAM BINGHAM, Ph.D., F.R.G.S.,

Assistant Professor of Latin-American History, Yale University.

A book for which the publisher's claim of unusual timeliness will not be denied is this by the well-known South American Explorer and Archæologist. His knowledge of the attitude of the Southern Republics towards the Monroe Doctrine is both exact and convincing. The author makes a powerful plea for a reconsideration and a remoulding of this Doctrine, which he maintains is an outgrown policy, a shibboleth, rather than a law, since its continuity must depend on our willingness to enforce its pretensions by force of arms. The Mexican situation emphasizes the need of a careful revision of the tenability of our claims under this Doctrine.

Hon. William Kent said in the House of Representatives recently:

"I wish to be of service to the Congress and to the people of the United States, by bringing to their attention a remarkably thoughtful and able essay on 'The Monroe Doctrine: An Obsolete Shibboleth.'"

This article, greatly amplified from its original form in the Atlantic Monthly, is now published by the Yale University Press.

The Boston Herald says in an editorial: "There is probably no living American scholar better qualified by long study and experience to discuss this critical subject than Professor Bingham."

JOHN BACH McMASTER'S

A HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

From the Revolution to the Civil War

VOLUME 8, just published, marks the completion of this treasure of American history. It represents the intelligent and laborious research of thirty years, and is a monument to the author's extraordinary industry. McMaster's work is a history of the people in the strict sense, rather than a mere history of the government. It deals with social quite as much as with political activities. So intimate is this history, so vivid and readable, that its pages often read like records of contemporaneous events. The work shows skill, animation, brightness, force and charm and is unquestionably the most important history of the people of the United States ever written.

GEORGE L. RIVES

"The Relations Between the Two Countries from the Independence of Mexico to the Close of the War With the United States."

He says: "The events which led up to the war between the United States and Mexico, with all its momentous consequences to both nations, have been very generally misapprehended. . . .

"It has been my object to present a consecutive narrative of the events which culminated in war in 1846 and peace in 1848. . . .

". . . it is not doubtful that some lessons of extreme importance may be drawn from a study of our dealings with the nearest of our Latin-American neighbors."

MAURICE HEWLETT

Turns Light Upon a Character of Great Interest in His New Novel

BENDISH

A Colorful Romance of Late Georgian England. Identity of the Handsome and Talented Young Nobleman Will Excite Curiosity.

Early in the story you get this glimpse of the singular personality of Lord Bendish:

"A marble-faced young man with a dark head of curly hair and intensely dark eyes lay absorbed upon the sofa Every feature of him was as sharp and still as statuary; if he assumed rapture in his work, he assumed it well. Enveloped in a white Turkish gown, he was writing, with his knees for desk. Open books were strewn about him; he blew and sucked at a water-pipe which stood in visible commotion upon the floor beside him. He was very handsome; and sublimely uninterested in his visitor, although at the same time acutely aware of him."

Admiral Dewey tells a simple, forthright story of his career from Vermont boyhood through two wars, to his retirement as one of three ever to attain the grade of Admiral in our navy. His account is, first, a graphic narrative of adventure:—he fought through the Civil War—was at Mobile and New Orleans—and of course through the War with Spain.

Second:—A revelation of a large, brave, simple character.

And third:—An uncovering of the plain facts of many obscure but significant events; a first-hand account of important episodes of our history.

Raises From Oblivion Some of America's Greatest Heroes, the Men Who Won Us Half Our Territory.

GENTLEMEN ROVERS

Describes the Brilliant Careers of Eaton, Reed, Smith, Ward, Walker, Boyd, Etc., Great Conquerors.

The author in preface names several typical episodes:

"Eaton and his motley army marched across six hundred miles of African desert, and by bringing the Barbary despots to their knees accomplished that which had been unsuccessfully attempted by every naval power in Europe. Captain Reed, of the General Armstrong, after holding off a British force twenty times the strength of his own, sunk his vessel rather than surrender. William Walker came within an ace of changing the map of Middle America, and made the name of American a synonym for courage from the Rio Grande to Panama, while on the other side of the world another American, Frederick Townsend Ward, raised and led that ever-victorious army whose exploits were General Gordon's chief claim to fame."

AN ELEMENTARY PSYCHOLOGY

By D. E. Phillips, Head of the Department of Psychology and Education in the University of Denver.

"To undertake a new method of treatment in this day of numerous publications upon the subject of psychology is a most difficult task. Professor Phillips seems successfully to have accomplished it. His treatment is novel and suggestive, dealing with psychic phenomena from a different viewpoint than they have been treated heretofore. It is well adapted to the needs of the beginner. With its graphic treatment and lucid style the student is almost sure to comprehend the meaning of the author."

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF WendellPhillipsGarrison

Editor of The Nation 1865–1906

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1913.

The Week

Separated because of incompatibility of temper and, specifically, because of disagreement over the question who should be boss in the house, Progressivism and Republicanism are preparing to be reconciled for the sake of the child. The little one's name is, of course, Protective Tariff. The Congressional election in Maine and the passage of the tariff bill in the Senate have occurred in dramatic juxtaposition. Republicans and Progressives may differ on the eternal principles of social justice and the spirit of constitutional government, but on the question of high tariff duties they find it easy to agree, and, apparently, to win. Therefore, the talk of a national convention to bring about a reunion of the two factions has broken forth with renewed vigor. It is true that so far most of the talk about reunion has come from the side of the Republicans. The Bull Moose are verbally as hostile to the idea as they have ever been. But verbally; in practice they have simply been flocking back to the Republican fold in the most natural way in the world. There is no need for the Progressive leaders to say anything; the registration and election returns speak for them. After all, the eternal principles of social justice, being eternal, can presumably wait; whereas the protective tariff needs all the champions it can get, and needs them now.

It is not necessary for the Vice-President of the United States to be an authority on banking and currency questions; but neither is he under any obligation to talk about them. It is, of course, the privilege of a newspaper reporter to ask a Vice-President the question, "What is your opinion of the currency question?" but it is quite as indisputably the privilege of the Vice-President to decline to satisfy the reporter's desire for "copy." Doubtless it was owing to his invincible good nature that Mr. Marshall the other day, as reported in the New York Times, failed to adopt that course and the result is that he indicates his idea of the purpose of the Banking and Currency bill as follows:

> Some banking system which will prevent the hoarding of money until it commands very high interest, and which will permit sufficient elasticity to prevent recurrent panics, must be devised.

It is a pity that the House Committee completed its long and difficult labors without the benefit of this simple and straightforward statement, for we fear that the idea of preventing "the hoarding of money until it commands a high rate of interest" was sadly neglected in the deliberations of the Committee. But the reporter, evidently an enterprising young gentleman, was still unsatisfied, and so we have this further contribution to the subject:

> "Isn't the pending measure, with its reserve bank provision, really the reinstatement of the old United States Bank?" he was asked.
> "As a Democrat inoculated with the principles of Jefferson and Jackson," Mr. Marshall answered, "I am not sure it is not going back to the old ideas of the United States Bank."

Very like a whale, quoth Polonius; and Polonius, too, was a man who talked rather more than was absolutely indispensable.

A most extraordinary thing has happened in Louisiana. Its Legislature has adjourned after being in session a few minutes less than four days. Six important measures proposed by the Governor were put before both houses and carried within this period of time, with but eight adverse votes in the House and two in the Senate. Not one of the measures was amended in any important manner, and thousands of dollars were saved by this prompt transaction of business. The most important action taken was for the submission to the people of a proposal for a Constitutional Convention in November next, which will be limited, however, to a consideration of the bonded debt of the State, and a proposed amendment to the New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board act. This convention cannot, of course, be called unless approved at an election by the people. There is no doubt whatever that the people will approve, as the financial situation is pressing. Another important measure passed was one suggested by the Senatorial situation in Alabama. It provides that in the event of the death or resignation of a United States Senator from Louisiana the Governor shall fill the vacancy until such time as the people can elect. This is to bring the State procedure in line with the new amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for popular election of Senators.

With the promise in appeals that the prosecutions under the Mann act in California will continue to arouse comment and feeling, it is becoming evident that the act itself is a probable subject of attack. It is already alleged that it loads upon the Federal courts duties better left to the local police courts; that it weakens suppression of the very traffic against which it was aimed, by confounding it with mere immorality; that it draws no distinction between offences of widely different degrees of guilt; and that the penalty for other crimes, lumped by it with so-called "white-slavery," is always, and sometimes unjustly, imposed upon but one party, the man. These are criticisms that demand consideration; but it is essential that, if any modification of the law is to be made, it shall not be such as to impair its severity or its efficacy in relation to the vile and cruel traffic for the suppression of which the act was designed.

President Wilson's sending of an agent to confer with the parties to the Calumet copper strike comes at the same time as intimations that Gov. Ferris was ready to call a special session to end the trouble. What the now unnecessary session would have done is of peculiar interest in a situation not unlike the recent strikes in West Virginia and Colorado. The legislators regarded the payment of the $250,000 required to maintain troops in the strike district as the chief issue. Although the companies virtually own the copper counties, the repeal of a recent law leaves the protection of their property a burden on the entire State. More important to the ordinary observer was a proposal for a compulsory arbitration law and the immediate appointment of an arbitration board. But little has been proposed and less done to stop the sporadic rioting and shooting that have tormented the district even under militia protection. There have been threats of "putting the gunmen out of the district," and several arrests of agitators for "inciting to riot"; but the clashes between patrolmen and armed miners have gone on, the press reporting that the gunmen have "kept up night firing to keep the militia on a constant search," and that the militia have attested by inaction that they were neutral in the dispute. In Michigan, as in West Virginia and elsewhere, the local papers insist that, no matter how the strike ends and its expense is distributed, an investigation should determine the responsibility for its scenes of violence.

The true note of the new South comes to us in an editorial in the Lexington, Ky., Herald in regard to the segregation of the colored employees of the Government at Washington. "Knowing," it says, "that many will disagree with our views, and condemn bitterly our expression thereof," it none the less protests against this policy of the national Government, "the effect of which, transmitted to lower channels, may be most disastrous." "No greater calamity could befall this nation," it insists, "than to have included in its inhabitants millions of people of any race in whose face the door of hope is shut, who are not permitted to aspire to free and independent citizenship, and to strive for equal political, financial, and industrial reward that brawn or intellect brings to those of any race." These are brave words indeed, in shining contrast with the utterances of so many Southern Senators who claim to represent their section, and who certainly do represent the reactionaries and the ignorant.

It seems an anomaly that the third largest American city should be fighting for the removal of a whole district of unsanitary pig-farms from within its borders. But there is a deal of political hopefulness in Philadelphia's newest issue. There cannot be much question concerning the general merits of the present Mayoralty campaign. The public health has been safeguarded; the streets have been made cleaner; a new policy of economy has been inaugurated; the Police and Fire Departments have been taken out of politics. All this, and more, is effectively recited for the Blankenburg Administration in a pamphlet of the Civic Club. So long, therefore, as the specific fight turns upon a question of sanitation and attractiveness, with harbor and navy-yard considerations thrown in, the public is not likely to forget benefits received. The thousands of sties in South Philadelphia, as a menace to health, contravene such municipal regulations as almost, if not quite, every other large city has long since passed.

The celebration of Perry's victory is of especial interest to the Great Lakes, as recalling the one affair of the kind they have ever seen, and drowning, in its salutes and fanfares, the noise of our Canadian cousins over Chrysler's farm. Its pageants and water carnivals have given a long-extended thrill of patriotism to the lakeside ports at which the old fleet has touched. To the country at large the centenary looms small beside the half-centenary of Gettysburg. Its chief interest is in recalling a heroic deed and a heroic figure. Perry's exploit is, of all American naval victories, the one that would best have furnished a subject for Turner to paint. The Niagara was no Téméraire, but as our single important engagement between wooden fleets, Put-in-Bay links us to the days of Nelson and Rodney in a way no one-ship duels could do.

Two calamities are threatening the human race, according to reports from Colorado Springs, where the American Public Health Association is now meeting. One is the increase of insanity, and the other is the decrease in the birth-rate. As envisaged by one headline writer, the future presents a spectacle in which nobody will be born and everybody will be out of his mind. Fortunately, this condition of affairs promises something of the same consolation offered to the Irishman who received three serious wounds, one of which was bound to be fatal, but from the other two of which he might recover. A "birthless" race need not shrink from the advancing cloud of insanity, and an insane race is not apt to care much whether it is born or not. Lest, however, some timid person should refuse to see how the one evil cancels the other, let him turn from Colorado Springs to Birmingham, England, where recently the Association for the Advancement of Science was greatly concerned with the problem of over-population and food supply. People are still born in numbers sufficiently large to worry the scientists as to where sustenance for all of them is coming from. Or is it our duty to reconcile the findings of Birmingham and Colorado Springs and to look forward to a non-existent race of lunatics with nothing to eat?

"Food Inspection Decision No. 152," just issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, declares that brandy is the alcoholic distillate obtained solely from the fermented juice of fruit, distilled "under such conditions that the characteristic bouquet, or volatile flavoring and aromatic principles, is retained in the distillate." That is sound chemistry and common-sense. It will pass unchallenged by the medical profession and the consumer, however painful it may be to the compounding establishments where applejack, cognac, cherry brandy, and peach brandy are all made from the same barrel of crude spirits by the addition of flavoring extracts and coloring matter. The decision goes further, however, in defining grape brandy as the distillate obtained from grape wine under the conditions already set forth, in saying that other fruit brandies must be similarly prepared from the fermented juices of their respective fruits, and adding that "so-called brandy prepared from grain, potato, or other form of industrial alcohol, or from alcohol obtained from the by-products of wine manufacture, mixed with more or less true brandy or other flavoring material, is adulterated and misbranded unless labelled to indicate its true composition." Here is a step forward in the enforcement of the law by the Board of Food and Drug Inspection since the Taft Administration, which never arrived at a definition of what constitutes "straight whiskey." It is true that there was difference of opinion between a Kentuckian and a Marylander, an Irishman and a Scot, as to the best ingredients for whiskey, but all were virtually agreed as to labels until the compounders made it possible, by obtaining a favorable ruling from the earlier Food and Drug Board, to mix the alcoholic products of grain as they are now forbidden to mix the alcoholic products of fruit. Whatever injury results to public health and morals from the abuse of alcoholic stimulants is in part due to the adulteration of these products by the manufacturer.

A statistician of Indiana University has recently studied the qualifications, salary, and tenure of the high-school teachers of his State, with the usual startling results. On the surface, the outstanding and conventional fact would seem to be the low salaries. Out of 657 teachers, only one received a stipend of $2,000; less than 10 got $1,600; and 299 received less than $800. But there are other figures that prompt a doubt as to how many really were worth more pay. Of the 657 more than half held no degree, whether from normal school, college, or university; and even in cities of above 50,000, out of 281 high-school teachers, 120 had no special training. These facts are typical of many more States than Indiana. Even in the teaching world a natural law governs the relation between pay and ability. One hardly knows whether to feel indignation at the parents, or pity for the children, of backward communities; for in the words of the statistician, "school boards can secure any kind of teacher they wish if they demand the preparation and pay the price."

The complaint that our public schools have neglected the teaching of fundamentals for the teaching of fads and frills no longer holds against Chicago's school authorities. Mrs. Ella Flagg Young is going back to something more fundamental even than the three R's. She has begun to impart instruction in the law of self-preservation which is the first law of life. Time must henceforth be taken by the school principals from the regular curriculum for classroom talks, illustrated with motion pictures, on how to avoid accidents due to street traffic. There is a long list of cautions for children:

Cross the street at regular crossings, not in the middle of the block.

Obey the police signals at crossings.

Look in all directions before crossing the street.

Do not cross in front of a moving vehicle.

Danger signals from automobiles and cars should be heeded by every one.

Roller-skating in the roadway is forbidden by city ordinance.

Children should not hitch on to moving vehicles.

The majority of accidents to children do not happen when they are going to school or returning from school. There is great danger in playing backward and forward across the street, running across the street in the evening, hurrying to the show or the store, trying to overtake companions, running after a hat.

Is the number of mothers increasing who send their children into the streets without any injunction to be careful? Or is the number of children increasing to whom it matters very little what mother says but to whom Teacher embodies prestige and authority? It is the vicious circle again. The schools, as a type of social effort, are continually stepping in to make good the derelictions of the individual; and the individual is lulled into securer indifference. Because careless or ignorant parents have proved recreant to the gospel of the toothbrush, the schools are now exacting written pledges on the subject. And if a pledge of clean teeth falls within the province of the school, then why not a pledge against green apples, and a pledge against sleeping late, and a pledge against telling lies? Will the parenthood of the future develop into a sort of foremanship under school supervision? And in the case of a street fatality, will the mother of the child victim have a just grievance against the child's teacher?

Although every party attempt to read a political significance into the labor riots at Belfast has failed, it is notable that they have given a marked impetus to the insurance business, based upon an apprehension which looks to the political future. The English attitude towards Ulster has always been that it takes two to make a quarrel, and that as truculent drills and blustering speeches increase in the province, imperturbable good nature offers the best opposition to them. Even the latest programme of the Ulster Union, for September mass-meetings from Belfast to Derry, and the formation of a Provisional Government against the Home Rule bill's third reading, does not disturb British phlegm. The Government's disregard of technical treason and riotous rhetoric in the mouth of Sir Edward Carson, and its determination, in the face of the exaggerated temper of North Ireland, to let the Provisional Government, if it is ever formed, sit until it becomes a laughing stock, is beyond doubt a policy of wisdom. But the animus behind some of the labor outbreaks seems to be taken as warning that in a well-armed country, divided between Nationalists and Anti-Nationalists, the passage of Home Rule may be followed by sporadic rioting. Reports to the London Times show that in two days last week, $15,000,000 insurance was written in Ulster; that the previous week showed approximately $35,000,000 written; and that insurance companies, as in South Africa before the Johannesburg troubles, were attempting to secure as wide a distribution of risks as possible, to lessen the chance of concentrated losses.

In perhaps no journal in Europe would one be more justified in looking for a mature and intelligent judgment on the Administration's dealings with Mexico than in the London Economist. The leading article in its issue for August 30 is devoted to "Mexico and President Wilson's Message." In it there is no trace of the patronizing toleration or of the supercilious criticism which has been the note of a number of European newspapers less weighty and less well informed. On the contrary, the Economist acclaims the President's message as "the sincere attempt of a Constitutional ruler and trained jurist to insure that the Government of Mexico shall be based on a legal foundation beyond question." While the Economist recognizes that the contentions of those who argue in favor of the immediate recognition of the Huerta Government are plausible, it declares that President Wilson "may claim to have taken a longer and a broader view." As for the view of some "observers on the Continent" that the message was but "an ingenious move towards the annexation of Mexico," the Economist dismisses that as superficial. "But armed intervention," it adds, "might lead to a war beside which the Boer War would seem simple and short; and it could hardly end in the harmony which has happily been the outcome in South Africa." Fortunately, the people of this country are thoroughly aware that such is the case; and neither the public at large nor the Administration at Washington contemplates armed intervention in any other light than as one of the greatest of possible calamities.

A SPLENDID ACHIEVEMENT.

With ranks unbroken except for the vote of the two Louisiana members, the Democrats of the Senate have set the seal of their approval upon the great work of tariff reform in which their fellows in the House had so faithfully done their part. Even the defection of the Louisiana members has not in it anything of a sinister character. One can sympathize with the feeling expressed by Senator Thornton when he declared that he voted against the bill only because he regarded it as a death-blow at the greatest agricultural interest of his State, however much one may feel that the radical measure of putting sugar on the free list is justified by the largest considerations of national policy. Apart from this extreme case, the party has presented, not only in the final vote, but in the whole character of its dealing with the many crucial questions that have arisen, a spirit which it is hardly going too far to characterize as heroic. The notion that, when it comes down to a practical test, the tariff is, after all, a "local issue," has been magnificently repudiated. The differences between Senate and House are not such as in the least to affect the character of the bill as a truly national measure of reform, a measure fulfilling completely the promises which, from the time of Cleveland's memorable message of 1887 to the present day, have embodied the clear purpose of all the true leaders of the party. The words in which President Wilson acclaimed the result are fully justified by the facts —"a fight for the people and for free business, which has lasted a long generation through, has at last been won, handsomely and completely."

For the clean-cut way in which the result has been accomplished, for holding together the forces in the case of many causes of dissension—and this without any debilitating compromise—the chief credit must be assigned to the President. That he was able to achieve this in spite of its entailing the protraction of the extra session throughout the trials of a Washington summer, would of itself be signal evidence of rare powers of leadership; but the achievement was made the more extraordinary by the circumstance that, almost from the start, Mr. Wilson's purpose was clearly to insist also on the passage at the extra session of a banking and currency bill. His complete success in the first undertaking cannot fail to increase greatly the strength of his position in regard to the second; and if he shall achieve both, he will have made a record of constructive leadership rarely matched in the annals of parties. How great is his indebtedness, and that of the nation, to the ability and steadfastness of Mr. Underwood, the whole nation recognizes; and the tribute he pays also to the faithful and efficient work of Senator Simmons is likewise deserved. While the first place in distribution of credit belongs to the President, a large share is due to the whole party as represented in Congress, and especially to the leaders in the two houses.

Of the changes made in the bill by the Senate which will presumably form the subject of serious consideration in conference, there are three of more general interest than any others. The introduction into the bill of the proposed tax on cotton "futures" is thoroughly vicious. It is, in itself, a bit of ignorant or demagogic interference with a legitimate and, on the whole, decidedly wholesome and beneficial part of the mechanism of business. It was adhered to by the Senate caucus in the face of earnest opposition by eight Southern Democratic Senators who did not speak in behalf of "Wall Street," and who were specially qualified to speak in behalf of the interests of the growers of cotton. And in addition to its inherent injuriousness, it is open to the gravest objection as being essentially of the nature of a "rider"—a provision of peculiar and highly controversial character tacked on to a general revenue bill in the hope of its being accepted because it cannot be separated from the bill as a whole. It ought to be firmly resisted by the House conferrees; and the same is true of the increased tax on works of art, for which there is not a shadow of respectable justification. The third change we have in mind relates to the income tax. The increases in the rates on incomes above $50,000 will probably be compromised in conference; the change in the lower limit—the exemption limit—will probably stand. But it ought to be clearly understood that, while the discrimination in favor of men with families is quite justified, the change by the Senate does not at all diminish—indeed it increases—the objection lying against the exemption as being too high. From this point of view, the raising of the $4,000 exemption to $5,000 in the case of married men with two children far more than counterbalances the lowering of the exemption to $3,000 in the case of single men.

But the conspicuous thing is not the differences between Senate and House, but their agreement. Nor is this concord remarkable only because item after item, hotly debated, has stood the test. It is far more remarkable because of the firmness with which a general principle, a general attitude, has been adhered to. That wonderful solution of the tariff question which, hardly more than a year or two ago, was acclaimed with such naïve delight in high quarters, has cut but a sorry figure. Not difference in cost of production, but the reasonable claims of the American people, has been the touchstone by which the rates have been determined. There has been no blind and sweeping reduction of duties, regardless of a just consideration for existing industries; but the doctrine that the manufacturer has a vested right in the home market, whatever it may cost his fellow-citizens, has been absolutely cast out. And all this has happened without any commotion or disturbance—almost without any protest in the public press except of the most perfunctory kind. To those whose memory is not hopelessly defective, we recommend the exercise of recalling how general, eight or ten years ago, was the notion that the American people had decided, for good and all, upon a policy of high protection, and that to reopen the question was merely to disturb business without the slightest prospect of accomplishing anything. The contrast between this state of mind and that shown by the passing of the present tariff bill with the general acquiescence of the nation affords a valuable illustration of the delusions of "manifest destiny."

THE WEST AND THE NEW AGRICULTURE.

The drought which week after week hung over the West this summer, with corn shrivelling and meadows browning under its sway, ponds contracting, and cattle being rushed to market, awakened a variety of comment. Sympathy found, as in former years, ready utterance by press and tongue. A ripple of apprehension spread over the country and into urban centres, where men had learned that failure of the sort quickly diffused its effects into the high cost of meat and cereals. There was a harking back to the years when drought was a grimly constant reality to Kansas and Nebraska, and when in the train of agricultural depression stalked spectral political and economic heresies. But when rain ended the suspense, and even those who appraised the damage highest admitted that various factors left the situation still bright, the public voice went to the other extreme. The resiliency with which the West shook off its load of disaster pointed to a new agricultural independence. The new agriculture was a magician's wand to stop the rising of plague, a force to conquer the elements when defeat was once passively accepted. Thus the Outlook said:

> The truth is that Western farmers have learned to get the most out of their soil. . . . This is due to the better methods of tillage. Agricultural college education and special trains giving practical instruction on right systems of planting and cultivation have had their effect. The modern farmer is a business man, and the drought has demonstrated that he now meets reverses, not in distress, but as one of the exigencies of his affairs.

At the same time, and in triumphant confirmation, was widely quoted the Government statement that wheat showed the highest acre-average—16.2 bushels—since the large wheat-planting era began.

But is it true that seeming disaster has twitched away the curtain that hid a great agricultural transformation? It should seem but too easy to confute or discount the fact alleged. Is the West thus energized because the despondent, short-sighted farmers of Willa Sibert Cather's "O, Pioneers!" have given way to a sturdier, more enlightened race? Rather because in a decade of fair weather and fair economic conditions the farmers have saved for a time of stress. Because crops which this year antedated the drought had so thriven that Gov. Hodges could say: "We raised a big wheat crop, a big oats crop, a big potato crop. Two cuttings of alfalfa were the best ever. And our bank deposits show $42,000,000 more than a year ago." Because the consciousness of high prices and increasing land values gave birth to a feeling of economic stability. Certainly there was no advanced agricultural knowledge to save the corn, or any great part of it; and a want of preparation was evident in the failure of stored water for beast and even man. As for the wheat record, it could be pointed out that, if the United States has never before reaped 16.2 bushels per acre, it has repeatedly risen near that figure, and repeatedly fallen from it; and that in the uneven line which records our crop-average, one year's result can no more serve as the index of a fixed tendency than can a single swallow of seasonal change. The average yield of corn in 1899 was 28.1 bushels; in 1909, 25.9. The average yield of oats in 1899 was nearly 30 bushels; in 1909, barely 28. And even if a study of decades showed a consistent improvement, allowance would still have to be made for such factors as the growth of intensive farming in the wake of a crowding population, and the abandonment in exhausted portions of the East of the crops staple to the West.

But while the notion that the new agriculture is to be credited with every favorable turn that may be noted in the crop situation is an illusion, the impression at the bottom of the notion is not wide of the truth. The new agriculture is making a new earth; it is only an exaggeration of its powers that streaks this truth with error. The public sees that the rural West is prosperous as no rural section has been since Washington first experimented with crop rotation on his Virginia farm. From this prosperity it turns to the great machinery of agricultural betterment that Western society has built up. At its centre is the State university; as radiating agencies are extension classes, demonstration farms and trains, the experiment station, bulletins, seeds, travelling soil analysts and dairy testers, the lecturer, and the adviser. Apart from these official agencies are the activities of the farmers' institute, the State fair, the farm paper, the commercial houses that flourish only when the farmer flourishes, and the rural centre of every sort. Advancement is infectious where one farmer plants a new variety of fruit with which the State has succeeded, and his neighbors in turn copy him. A rural life thus intelligent, into which professionally trained men are constantly infused, and to the improvement of which every communal assistance is given, is a guild for the prosecution of its calling that history will find it hard to match. Many farmers yet are skeptical, unprogressive, inclined rather to trust in labor than in science or thought. But, for all that, the face of the farm States is changing in a way not unsuggestive of what is taking place in the modern city itself.

How is the face of the West changing? In Illinois, says one newspaper, "silos and alfalfa are the solvers of the dried-up-pasture problem. A few more years and these cylindrical storehouses will dot the prairies as corncribs do now. And steadily the green fields of alfalfa are creeping over the black soil of Illinois, making a stand where once the farmer thought it would be impossible." The same correspondent of a Kansas City paper who found western Kansas filled with disgusted men—land speculators who came out to pick up bargains, and found none—also found the country transformed by crops undreamed of a few years before, the dairy and the poultry farm where once grain reigned alone, trees and orchards breaking the prairie winds. The writer for a Nebraska paper, who went to the State fair, learned that the whole State grew crops unknown anywhere in it a quarter of a century ago, that wholly new varieties of corn, oats, and wheat had been devised, and that a newer tillage was changing even the soil. He saw, too, much new machinery; but it is no longer invention, but science, that is transforming the farm. For that reason, much of the change is invisible. It is the change from farms productive in their ill-kept virginity to a farm production that rests on scientific cultivation, careful conservation, and the energetic utilization of every discovery, from Pasteur's fifty years ago to Babcock's and Hopkins's to-day. This general improvement of a fundamental calling is one of the most impressive facts of the generation.

THE CONSULS SAFEGUARDED.

Most gratifying news comes out of Washington in regard to the consular service. On Wednesday of last week President Wilson sent to the Senate the nominations of thirty men for high consular posts, of whom no less than twenty-eight are already in the service, while the other two have passed examinations entitling them to appointment. This should end much anxiety, both in and out of the consular service.

Within, the consuls have complained that they had no inkling as to whether they should be retained or have to seek other employments. Outside of it, too, the fear has been that, as in the diplomatic offices, there would be a more or less clean sweep, with a consequent undoing of the good accomplished since John Hay laid the foundations of a permanent consular service.

Instead of this we have the promotion of a number of men originally appointed by Republican Administrations. Chief of these is Alexander M. Thackara, who has been sixteen years in the service at Havre and Berlin; he now goes to the vacancy in Paris caused by the voluntary resignation of Frank H. Mason, a veteran consul of thirty-three years of consecutive service. To Dresden is sent Mr. Leo Bergholz, who has thirty-one years to his credit as a consular official, while to Calcutta is promoted James A. Smith, of Vermont, now at Genoa, whose first appointment bears date of 1897. It is men of experience like these who must form the backbone of any consular service, either of this country or of any other great nation. If the others have not had so many years of official life, they are all men who have been tried and not found wanting. They are eager permanently to represent the country abroad, and most of them have risen from the lower grades of deputy or vice-consul. Their political affiliations have obviously not been inquired into. Best of all is the leaving undisturbed of the present satisfactory Consul-General in London, John L. Griffiths. It is to be hoped that this foreshadows his permanent retention there, just as the appointment of two men who have passed examinations is good ground for believing that the vacancies created by the advancement of these thirty men will be filled only after advancement, on John Hay's plan, of subordinates now connected with consulates, or the appointment of others selected after passing prescribed tests.

Any other course would be deplorable retrogression, and would not be to the credit of the Wilson Administration. Whatever lapses there may have been, the last two Republican Presidents have steadily sought to establish precedents leading towards permanent consular officers. By Executive order they have sought to do what Congress itself should have done long ago. But the Congressional spoilsman dies hard, as witness the rage of Senator John Sharp Williams and others at the refusal of the new Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison, to consider the recommendations of Congressmen and Senators in the matter of promotions and assignments of army officers. Just as Congress cannot make up its mind to appropriate reasonable sums for the acquirement of proper residences for our Ambassadors on the Continent and in England, so it has always refused to create a permanent graded consular service, and every advance in that direction has had to come from the State Department itself.

But the present action is the more gratifying, if we are correct in believing it to be a clear indication of President Wilson's policy in regard to the consular service, by reason of its contrast with his treatment of the diplomatic posts. He had an unequalled opportunity to retain in service Ministers and Ambassadors of long experience, for he owed nothing to the politicians in the matter of his own election, and he had long been a civil-service reformer. But the pressure of the office-seekers was too strong to be resisted. While some of his appointments have been excellent, others have been the reverse. Thus it must have galled the President to read of the farewell dinner given to his Ambassador to Berlin by fifty Tammany men. In honoring Mr. Gerard, as in selecting Mr. Harrison for Governor-General of the Philippines, Mr. Wilson, wittingly or unwittingly, went to Tammany for two of its rich young men, ever ready with their campaign contributions to help keep alive that band of political pirates known as Tammany Hall. The minor diplomatic offices are now going to the ordinary hack politicians. Why, for instance, should William J. Price, of Danville, Ky., be sent as Minister to Panama? We have been unable to ascertain that he has had previous diplomatic service, or been anything else at home but a "prominent" local officeholder of mediocre abilities; and the same is true of others recently selected. Most disappointing has been Mr. Wilson's appointment of men like Mr. Penfield and Mr. Gerard, who contributed largely to his campaign fund. We have before us a vigorous protest from a reader against Mr. Morgenthau's selection for Turkey, on the same ground, and also because of his handling of the campaign funds. Anything that in any way connects diplomatic posts with money payments to a candidate or party is wholly regrettable, and Mr. Wilson cannot escape just criticism for this reason for several of his appointments.

THE BRYAN SCANDAL.

In his statement to the press on Sunday Mr. Bryan showed plainly that the continued criticisms of the newspapers, and particularly the foreign ones, on his lecturing for pay on Chautauqua circuits are beginning to make him wince. He felt that his foreign critics ought to know more about the facts before finding fault. It was not true that the Mexican and Japanese crises were so grave as rightfully to demand his full time. As for his home critics, he varied the usual answer of the Rooseveltian type of politician by substituting the epithet Tory for that of Wall Street, thus: "The domestic newspapers that have attacked me are all of the Tory stripe. Such attacks are to be expected. In the Tory newspapers the facts are distorted, and are twisted to suit the writers. There are reasons for those attacks." And he asked why it was that reporters who would not take $1,000 for the crime of murdering a man were willing to assassinate his reputation by misrepresenting facts.

Now, with Mr. Bryan's indignation at deliberate misrepresentation we have all sympathy. But we respectfully submit that nothing conscienceless yellow-journals have said about him could do him more harm than the simple fact that he is billed in circus style to appear between Swiss yodlers, bell-ringers, and sleight-of-hand performers. Mr. Bryan must have heard of William Allen White's Emporia, Kansas, Gazette, which is certainly not open to the charge of being a tool of Wall Street, or of being a Tory organ. We reprint the juxtaposition of names which we took from a page advertisement of that paper:

New York City Marine Band
Avon Sketch Club
English Opera Quintet
Neapolitan Troubadours
William Jennings Bryan
Elliot A. Boyl
Sears, the Taffy Man
Lorenzo Zwickey
Ed. Amhurst Ott

"And to think," adds the advertisement, "that all the supreme pleasure of this royal feast is yours for the mere payment of a few pennies a session under the season-ticket plan." And all of this is further cracked up to be "literary, musical, entertaining, instructive, devotional, inspirational, and life-building" —with the Secretary of State of the United States, holding the third office in rank in the country, as the special drawing card.

Now, the Nation, being published in the vicinity of Wall Street, has to admit its geographical damnation and to confess that it has been one of those journals which feel seriously concerned over the extra-official activities of Mr. Bryan. But there are no hidden motives for this, and there are no old scores it would even up. It simply has a deep respect for the office of Secretary of State, which transcends its interest in any given Secretary. It was not altogether displeased at Mr. Bryan s selection for his position, because it knew him to be a sincere devotee of peace. It has found much to admire in his conduct of his office, both in the Mexican and Japanese entanglements, and in his international peace-proposals. We, moreover, have not quarrelled with the idea that the Secretary of State or any other Cabinet official may from time to time accept pay for giving a lecture. We have no prejudice against the Chautauqua itself, and do not dispute that Mr. Bryan's discourses are all that he advertises them to be. He admirably expounds the homely virtues, the gospel of peace and human brotherhood, and probably gives to many of those who hear him better preaching and ethical teaching than otherwise falls to their lot. We are even willing to accept without question a Washington journalist's assertion that Mr. Bryan has actually spent more hours at his office than did his immediate predecessors in the same amount of time, and that when in Washington he works untiringly, often until late at night.

Despite all this we are deeply outraged by the spectacle of the Secretary of State appearing nightly under canvas for pay, or a part of the gate-receipts, in company with acrobats and vaudeville performers of every kind. We can most sincerely assure Mr. Bryan that in this part of the country our feeling is shared by all those who reverence our institutions and believe in their being dignified by those entrusted with the duty of governing. Into this feeling nothing enters which could properly be termed anti-democratic. When Mr. Wilson as Governor proposed to talk to his constituents annually from the steps of every county court house, it seemed to us an admirable plan. But no money consideration entered into it, and no jugglers or xylophone artists were included in the programme. We have no quarrel because the Secretary of State wishes to meet crowds of his fellow-citizens and draw inspiration from them. But we do protest emphatically at what is now going on—a Secretary of State cutting short conferences with foreign Ambassadors to rush off to a little town in West Virginia or Maryland to earn his $250; then returning to Washington by sleeper for a few hours at his office, and finally dashing off again for a wild night ride by auto or a train journey to some obscure hamlet. There, it is obvious, he appears not before a real old-fashioned Chautauqua—which was a dignified university extension type of movement—but before a vaudeville audience, with Sears, the Taffy Man, and Howard Jones's trained seals preceding or succeeding him in the limelight.

If Mr. Bryan will take our advice he will cease defending these performances and either resign his position forthwith, if he cannot live within his official means, or rest his case squarely upon his having the President's sanction for his performances. No other course appears to us to be possible. If that puts the responsibility for what seems to us nothing less than a scandal directly upon President Wilson, it is merely placing it where it already belongs. The President is charged with the duty of controlling his Cabinet, and the task of keeping its members in bounds when they exceed the proprieties, and that duty cannot be shirked even when the relationship is such as to call for most tactful and diplomatic procedure on the President's side.

WILLIAM J. GAYNOR.

Death has suddenly removed from the whirl of city life the most striking and extraordinary figure in New York; and he was snatched away at a moment when his part in the city's affairs was at its maximum of distinctiveness and perhaps of importance. If any one had been asked why there was any prospect of Mr. Gaynor's election as Mayor next November, the best short answer would have been that it was because he was the most interesting man in New York. The nature of the interest he excited was not simple; it was compounded of many elements. There was admiration for his courage; there was appreciation of his originality; there was delight in his wit and his almost unparalleled power of terse and pungent expression; there was wonder at the comprehensive range of his interests and sympathies, the readiness of his response to anything that smacked of genuine human interest, from the plaints of a strap-hanger or a push-cart man to the dreams of a Tolstoy or the theories of a Henry George.

In his public career, whatever its faults—and in our judgment they were many and grave—the dominant note was courage. It was his courage and success in fighting Boss McKane, at a time when bosses were far more difficult to fight than they are now, that first brought Mr. Gaynor into public notice; and we believe it can be said without qualification that from that day to his death he never flinched from attacking what he wished to attack, or defending what he wished to defend. Whatever position he made up his mind to maintain on any subject, that position he was never deterred from maintaining by fear either of criticism or of consequences. Signal examples of this will easily occur to any one. Among them are instances which we do not count to his credit, but which, in spite of the condemnation they justly aroused, undoubtedly served with many only to emphasize the identification of his personality with the idea of audacious courage. Of this his course in the Rosenthal-Becker police scandal and its sequels is the most remarkable example. But his career abounded with manifestations of courage and firmness for which unalloyed praise is due him. No politician, or group of politicians, dictated his policy; and he was afraid neither of labor organizations nor of newspapers. His masterful dealing with the garbage-men's strike was a signal proof of the former; and, though his sweeping denunciations of newspapers in general often overshot the mark, the predominant feature in them was a seathing contempt for yellow journalism. His undeviating and unstinted hostility to Hearst is deserving of special recognition and gratitude.

That this rare courage, this unusual independence of mind, and the remarkable powers both of thought and of expression with which Mr. Gaynor was gifted, did not result in such a career in the Mayoralty as might have been hoped from these qualities was due to elements of character into which it is not necessary now to enter. But while his faults were such as sufficed to justify most serious criticism, they were far from being such as, in the heat of the present campaign, were by some imputed to him. No appeal to the consideration due the dead is needed for the rejection of any such view of Mr. Gaynor, or for the acknowledgment of much faithful and valuable service rendered by him to the city. That he would have been unable to render that service had his Tammany associates been elected with him four years ago, as he wished, we feel quite certain; but none the less must it be acknowledged that he set his face firmly against the Tammany idea of city government, stood stanchly by the merit system in subordinate offices, and from the first stamped upon the city's affairs as a whole the mark of a business administration. How profoundly the city was impressed with this when it was fresh was amply manifested in the unqualified praise he received from newspapers that had opposed him, throughout the first year of his Mayoralty—praise which reached its climax when he lay wounded, and in peril of death, three years ago. His death now is, in all human probability, a consequence of that shot; and that shot would, in all human probability, never have been fired but for the Mayor's firm and defiant refusal to conduct his office on the spoils principle.

Mr. Gaynor's entry into the present Mayoralty contest was a public misfortune. The prospect of his being a candidate brought confusion into the situation, as it pointed straight to a disastrous division of the anti-Tammany forces. Had this factor not entered, the argument in favor of a solid front being presented by the whole Fusion ticket would have been much stronger; and with Mitchel, McAneny, Prendergast, and Whitman enthusiastically uniting their efforts the prospect of a great victory for good government would have been very bright.

CHANGES IN PRONUNCIATION.

LONDON, September 8.

As a rule, the correspondence columns of the London Guardian, the leading Church of England paper, appeal only to the ecclesiastical mind. The outsider is merely amazed and bewildered as he glances over page after page devoted to animated discussions of the minutiæ of liturgiology. Now and again, however, one discovers an oasis in these desert stretches of mediævalism. The last five issues have contained a really enlightening series of "letters to the editor" on changes in the pronunciation of English. The subject was started in an article by the Rev. J. E. Field, who took as his text the recent argument of the Poet Laureate in favor of spelling reform.

Mr. Field's thesis is that "the correct phonetic rendering of sounds in 1913 may have become quite incorrect in 2013, and extensive changes in spelling may mean worse trouble for our great-grandchildren." Opinions will doubtless vary as to the validity of his conclusion. The interesting point is the evidence presented by him, and by other correspondents of the Guardian, as to changes now in process. Mr. Field begins by reminding us that when Cowper wrote the lines, "God moves in a mysterious way. . . . He plants His footsteps in the sea," and again, "I am monarch of all I survey. . . . From the centre all round to the sea," these were good rhymes, for the English sea was sounded like the German See. So, too, the tea of our great-grandmothers was tay. Do we realize, asks Mr. Field, the extent to which similar changes are occurring at the present time?

Take vowel sounds, to begin with. We have made a revolutionary change in the sound of i, which in the time of Queen Elizabeth was pronounced in English as it still is in all other languages. One of the last survivors of Queen Victoria's bridesmaids always said oblecge. The modern tendency is still gaining ground. Mr. Field has noticed a growing habit among the clergy to say inspiration, a practice which suggests the uncomfortable reflection that probably a coming generation will say spirit. The name of the Oxford saint, Fridswide, is now commonly hardened into the harsh and inharmonious Frideswide.

Again, the present-day tendency to pronounce the first vowel in Berkshire like that in birch illustrates how a once common sound of e, especially before r, is dropping out of use. In ancient writing Berkshire often appears as Barkshire and park as perk, showing that at one time er and ar were regarded as convertible. Person and parson give further evidence of the same point. Nowadays such words as Hertford, Derby, and clerk are becoming victims to what Mr. Field calls "the vulgar tendency to force all syllables under a rigid rule." Forty years ago yallow was not uncommon in the upper ranks of society, but it has now "succumbed to the destructive agency of education." A curious instance is English, which we spell with an e and pronounce with an i, in spite of the suggestion of its original vowel sound given in the equivalent Angles.

The letter o receives considerable attention in the Guardian discussion. The word currant indicates what our forefathers took to be the right way to pronounce Corinth. Among proper names the best-known survivals of the old pronunciation are London and Somerset. But Compton (correctly pronounced like company), Cromwell, Ponsonby, Monmouth, and Montgomery are yielding to the desire for standardization. Foreign has long since capitulated, and so has sovereign, where the vowel once had the same sound as in covenant.

Another correspondent remembers that, as a boy, he was caned for sounding the aspirate in humble, but now everybody sounds it. Possibly, Uriah Heep accelerated the change in usage. Formerly, as Mr. Field recalls, we followed the French rule of aspirating the h in our Teutonic words, but not in our Latin words. We still ignore the aspirate in pronouncing heir, hour, honest, and honour. The seniors among us retain this rule in the case of herb and hospital (of whose original pronunciation the word ostler is also an evidence), but the juniors have adopted the prevailing prejudice against allowing written letters to be silent. In the Guardian discussion no one has called attention to the curious difference between the English and the American treatment of h in unaccented syllables. An Englishman speaks of an (h)istorical treatise, ignoring the h altogether in his pronunciation, but an American of a historical treatise. The explanation seems to be that this difference is the natural and inevitable result of the difference between the English and the American treatment of particles. An American gives the particle a the full sound of the same letter in "fate," and detaches it completely from the following word, with a distinct pause between them. An Englishman, on the other hand, makes his a short, and runs it rapidly on to the next word. Thus, while the American gives equal value to each word in a religious treatise, in the Englishman's mouth this becomes almost urreligious treatise. Now, suppose the second word begins with h. If its first syllable is accented, full value can be given to the aspirate, however rapid the pronunciation. But the attempt to pronounce an unaccented h syllable in rapid connection with the previous word produces only an uneuphonious grunt. A history can be uttered at the highest speed of which the human vocal organism is capable, but a historical is a problem.

But to return to the Guardian discussion. Several letters note changes in popular usage with regard to accent. Balcóny has given way to bálcony, and revénue to révenue. So, too, precédence and fanátic are now frequently pronounced préccdencc and fánatic. Complaint is made that many of the clergy nowadays say Deútcronomy instead of Deutcrónomy, although they do not follow out their principles consistently by saying also pálwography, ástronomy, or géology. The general tendency thus seems to be to throw the accent further back. Mr. Field notes, and regrets, an example of the reverse process in doctrinal, which in many churches nowadays is pronounced not dóctrinal, but doctrí'nal. Somebody, apparently, remembered suddenly that the i in doctrina is long, and did not stop to reflect that the question is governed not by the quantity of the i in the substantive, but by the accent of the adjectival form, doctrinalis. Will the day come, Mr. Field wonders, when we shall be told that such pronunciations as doctrí'nal are entirely natū'ral?

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

Bernard Shaw, somewhere in one of his innumerable and interminable prefaces, has complained that critics have traced his literary relationships to Nietzsche, Ibsen, Strindberg, and others, whereas they might have had the patriotism to discover his ancestors in his own native Britain. In fact, he suggested Charles Lever, the author of a novel which made a lasting impression upon him as a boy, a Capt. Wilson, and a certain Mr. Stuart Glennie. Now, I purpose to do Mr. Shaw the slight courtesy he desires; yes, I shall go to an Englishman who was even educated in Ireland—but I shall go back to the seventeenth century. Impossible? Shaw, who made sport of Ramsden because he had not an idea later than eighteen sixty, can he be found in the sixteen hundreds?

The differences between Shaw and Congreve are many and obvious, yet it is nevertheless true that the Restoration Comedy, of which I take Congreve as an example, presents many similarities to Shaw. The great abiding difference is the spirit in which these characteristics are displayed. My comparison shall be general between Shaw and Congreve, but where I grow specific, as in quotations, I shall have reference to "The Way of the World" and "Man and Superman."

Both Shaw and the drama after 1660 are reactionary. The former is a reaction against present thought and sentiment, the latter against the previous period of Puritanism. But there is a difference in the character of the reaction. One is a natural unconscious process, the other a deliberate antagonism. The Restoration theatre is like the unwinding of a spring just released. Shaw is a gun deliberately aimed and intentionally fired. But the difference is everything.

Congreve is immoral, but though we cannot accuse Shaw of immorality, we cannot approve him as moral. I confess this is a treacherous ambiguous use of the word "moral." The immorality of Congreve is a downright vulgarity; the unmorality of Shaw is only a theory of ethical conduct. But the effect of both is, in a way, the same: neither tends to uplift our moral character—though Shaw seriously means to uplift it by giving us a new basis, a new Decalogue. He desires to tear us from our moral moorings, believing them to be rotten, and to steer us for a new port. Again the difference in spirit is everything.

In particular, the Restoration drama presents three phenomena—(1) an absence of the breath of nature, (2) an anti-social spirit, and (3) an abundance of wit. And Shaw likewise.

Of nature as beauty, as romance, as a something, as a pulse to give feeling to the play, of this you hear nothing in Shaw or Congreve. Of nature as a philosophy of the life force in the one, and of nature in the other as a system of etiquette, of these you read. In the five acts of "The Way of the World" all the scenes, with the exception of two, are within doors. In "Man and Superman" three of the four acts are in the open, in a park or among the mountains, but these scenes are used merely as a means of physical location, and never in any of the lines are they referred to with any poetic charm. Nature does not exist.

Nature is wanting, but society is present. Both plays are anti-social; that is, both plays mock current, conventional society. Shaw attacks our mockeries seriously and remorselessly. Congreve is not so genuine. Indeed, there is the feeling that society is used only as a means to show off his wit. He certainly is not as conscious of a purpose to laugh at the précieux of his day as Shaw is of satirizing the "respectable" people of to-day. But yet words are not merely sounds; they convey thought, and Congreve does mock his society. Let us hear both him and Shaw.

Mirabell: I denounce against all strait lacing, squeezing for a shape, till you mould my boy's head like a sugar-loaf, and instead of a man child, make me father to a crooked billet. Lastly, to the dominion of the tea-table I submit with proviso that you exceed not in your province, but restrain yourself to native and simple tea-table drinks, as tea, chocolate, and coffee: as likewise to genuine and authorized tea-table talk—such as mending of fashions, spoiling reputations, railing at absent friends, and so forth—but that on no account you encroach upon the men's prerogative, and presume to drink healths or toast fellows.

And Shaw:

Tanner: We live in an atmosphere of shame. We are ashamed of everything that is real about us; ashamed of ourselves, of our relatives, of our incomes, of our accents, of our opinions, of our experience, just as we are ashamed of our naked skins. Good Lord, my dear Ramsden, we are ashamed to walk, ashamed to ride in an omnibus, ashamed to hire a hansom instead of keeping a carriage, ashamed of keeping one horse instead of two and a groom-gardener instead of a coachman and footman. The more things a man is ashamed of, the more respectable he is.

Both are saying what they mean, but only one of them is stirred. Here, also, perhaps, is the place to remark that neither Shaw nor Congreve is a master of character. It is not character, but manners, that they describe.

As to wit, both rank high. Not humor, but wit, characterizes both Shaw and Congreve, though occasionally there is an inclination in both of them to a bit of horse-play, as in the superfluous third act of "Man and Superman," and Act IV of "The Way of the World." Shaw is sharp; Congreve polished. Shaw is the keenness of a stiletto's edge; Congreve is the gleam of its polished surface. Congreve is a wit; Shaw is a wit with a purpose. Yet frequently their styles of scintillation approximate each other, so that you could scarcely tell, for instance, unless you had read one of the plays, who wrote the following:

Let us never visit together, nor go to a play together; but let us be very strange and well-bred; let us be as strange as if we had been married a great while, and as well-bred as if we were not married at all.

Even the English does not betray the author.

Or take this selection:

Fainall: 'Tis for the honor of England that all Europe should know we have blockheads of all ages.

Mirabell: I wonder there is no act of Parliament to save the credit of the nation, and prohibit the exportation of fools.

The following lines indicate the difference in intent in the two authors:

Mrs. Marwood: Faith, by marrying; if I could but find one that loved me very well, and would be thoroughly sensible of ill usage, I think I should do myself the violence of undergoing the ceremony.

And Shaw:

Tanner: We do the world's will, not our own. I have a frightful feeling that I shall let myself be married because it is the world's will that you should have a husband.

"Nihil novi sub sole"—not even Shaw.

PROFESSOR KITTREDGE AS TEACHER OF LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The writer of an article on Professor Kittredge which appeared in your issue of September 11 "does not recall that any one has acknowledged indebtedness to him for a 'love of good literature,'" and is "inclined to doubt whether he considers it any part of his function to impart to his students a love of literature"; and again: "Professor Kittredge has taken few chances at making great literary historians or critics." That many of Professor Kittredge's students will protest against these assertions I have no doubt; personally I cannot refrain from offering my testimony on the point.

Specializing in English, I studied eight years at four institutions of repute, but from no course did I receive more illumination through the interpreting of literature than I obtained from English 2 at Harvard (Professor Kittredge's course on six plays of Shakespeare). Notably I recall an entire hour given to portraying the character of Lady Macbeth, introduced by the words: "Lady Macbeth is one of the simplest, strongest, and greatest characters in literature." The tone of the words as they were uttered is in my ears as I write, and the lecture still seems to me to sustain the tradition of Hazlitt, Lamb, and Coleridge. Then there was the evolution of Lear's madness; the keen differentiation of Goneril and Regan; Edmund, the natural son, trusting in his native villany; the submissive faithfulness of Helena and the "gentle raillery" of the Countess in "All's Well"; with, not least, the triumphant readiness of Falstaff's wit to about-face and meet a new emergency. Nor shall I forget how our attention was called to Banquo's whimsicality, to the contrasting servants who bring tidings to Macbeth in Act V, the dual phases of Kent and Edgar, etc., etc. These are separate points, but I also felt that by Professor Kittredge's magic (I use the word advisedly, though speaking of a "scientific" man) the plays we read were unfolded before us as living organic wholes of art. As to stylistic points, we were made aware of the splendid diction of the witches at Macbeth's last interview, of Vernon's eulogy on Prince Hal, even of the "Russian" in "All's Well," concerning which our instructor said that he pitied any one who had not sufficient appreciation of nonsense to enjoy it. Besides, there were comparisons with Greek tragedies and citations of English poems.

These instances are set down after an interval of ten years on the spur of the moment without any reference to my notes or to the plays, and I could go on almost indefinitely. I have perhaps recorded enough to indicate the spirit of the course as a whole, but I can never express the inspiration it was and is to me. The scientific attainments of Professor Kittredge are admired and applauded by all; let any one who has glanced over the preceding remarks decide whether this eminent scholar "considers it any part of his function to impart to his students a love of literature."

THE IDEAL REPUBLIC OF LEARNING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If Goethe is right in saying that we possess only what we enjoy, the intellectual life can hardly be accounted among the visible possessions of American undergraduates. What they learn is seldom assimilated to the extent of coloring their ways of thought and speech; what they learn they seem seldom to justify to themselves. Passing from the classroom to the liberal air of the campus, they lapse—if lapse be necessary—by an easy descent into the undiscriminating and surface thinking, the flat and ill-articulated speech of the uneducated. Is it not clear that the college community often furnishes in stimulating contact of mind with mind a poor substitute for the family circle that recognizes in table talk and fireside talk the claims of the spirit?

In spite of much anxious legislation, our college authorities fail to control student life at many vital points. Students may not drink to excess, their dances may not last after midnight—each law in its letter may be observed—but how about the authority of culture, which the united voice of the faculty presumably declares? Is this voice heard above the acclaim that comes from the athletic field and is it echoed in the casual conversations of students? Even to attentive ears, of course, it may come very faintly from the professors who have been "rooting" at the big game. Surely, every one knows that what is called "keeping in touch with the students" amounts very often to a frank repudiation of truly academic values and preferences. With such melancholy examples, we cannot blame the students if the whole community is not of one mind upon the need of elevating and refining its common life. For if gold rust, what shall iron do?

The ways and means of forming an academic society that will rest firmly upon an intellectual basis and not be overgrown with a thicket of silly organizations and movements are not clear; but something might be accomplished by a more liberal classroom policy, one in which the personality of teacher and of student should have freer play, one that should seem less like forbidding personal discipline. Course examinations, if required at all, should be of minimum importance, students being tested in broad and searching subject examinations, in preparation for which they would develop the initiative and self-direction of the educated mind. If they are to find themselves, they should be heartened to pursue independent studies—not necessarily "research"—stimulated at every turn by contact with men of light and leading. Under the existing system there is little nurture of self-respect in the case of the student who with necessarily indecent haste is trying to keep up with fussy and multifarious demands of scrap reading and inevitably hasty reports. If he is a man of original mind and consecutive thought, he will find it hard to excuse an instructor for introducing him to Arnold before he has finished his study of Carlyle, for confronting him with Keats just when he is beginning to see something in Shelley.

Little can be done without more vitalizing social contact among all who make up the university society. For what does culture count unless it is daily realized? And how is it realized unless it so permeates the social group that each member partakes of its beneficent power? The question is, of course, not one of generous communication from professors to students of all the requisites of Cardinal Newman's gentleman. The blunt fact is that the professors themselves have much to learn if they are to fill any better place than that which they occupy behind the classroom counter. It is not from that supposedly strategic point that they can do most towards the formation of that society within college walls without which it is not likely that our colleges will impress their stamp deeply and clearly upon the life of our people. If the professor's competence for his post is to be tested, it must be by the words of his mouth wherever uttered and by the daily meditations of his heart. J.

MRS. YOUNG AND THE CHICAGO SCHOOLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I write to protest against such an expression as I read on page 200 of your issue of September 4, in reference to Mrs. Young, superintendent of the public schools of Chicago. Mrs. Young has demonstrated her good judgment and wisdom, and she needs no defence. Her attitude in regard to the persistent demand for instruction in sex hygiene, namely, that it shall be taught by specially qualified and approved men and women, commends itself to people of good judgment. THE CATHOLIC PRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since you have of late permitted several contributions on the Roman Catholic Church, I take the liberty of presenting another.

Last April there was delivered at my room at Harvard a sample copy of the Menace. In it was an item dealing with the attitude of the Philadelphia North American towards a sermon of one Father Phelan, of St. Louis. It appeared that a subscriber had written to ask why the North American had paid so much attention to the speech of Gov. Blease, but had said nothing of Phelan's utterance, "To Hell with the Government of the United States." In reply the North American asserted that the priest had never made any such speech. Thereupon the Menace offered to prove that he had, and further offered a reward of one hundred dollars to the North American if it would publish the whole sermon. As the matter seemed to me to be one that would bear investigation, I wrote to the editor of the North American three different times, once a registered letter, but received no answer save that embodied in a return receipt. This experience, with another of more recent date, where the two local newspapers absolutely ignored a most revolting scandal connected with a priest (although one of them had not the slightest compunction about publishing an outrageous bit of ill-authenticated gossip regarding a recently married Protestant couple), lends an air of truth to the charge that there is a well-subsidized, carefully muzzled press in this country.

Apropos of G. H.'s communication, I have in my possession a book, entitled "Christian vs. Godless Schools," by T. J. Jenkins, published in 1889. It is endorsed by Cardinals Newman, James Gibbons, and others. From this book it is evident that in the minds of these men our schools are godless, and further that the following principle of action receives their endorsement:

> Neither is it expected of or designed by a Catholic, as God is our witness, that he should aid in any secret conspiracy for the bootless enterprise of suddenly overthrowing a public legal system, unlawful though that system be. We bring home to the consciences of Catholics that it is their duty to continue deserting all mere secular schools, and building schools of their own, until public opinion itself undermine what contains the source of its own downfall, and we be relieved of unjust taxes. (Italics are mine.)

On the same page we find the following: "Europe is convulsing in the ever-tightening folds of two serpents—the one public and deadly, the other secret and poisonous as the asp in the fig leaves of Cleopatra's basket. They are the public state schools and the Secret Societies of Continental Masonry." This little booklet, which ran through several editions, goes on in this way gibing at our public schools for 174 pages. Such then is the attitude of Rome towards the public school; it seems to square well with its regard for the free press.

WORDSWORTH MISQUOTED.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I wish to call attention to a flagrant misquotation which is to be found in the review of "Pickett and his Men," in the Nation for August 21. The lines in question are taken from Wordsworth's poem on the "Character of the Happy Warrior," and should read:

> Whom neither shape of danger can dismay,
> Nor thought of tender happiness betray.

The error lies in the substitution of the word "sinful" for "tender" as an epithet of happiness, thereby entirely transforming the meaning of the line, and making it absolutely foreign to the idea expressed in the rest of the poem. The thought of "sinful happiness" has no place in the poet's conception of a man of honor, neither is it appropriate to the character of Gen. Pickett.

As a lover of Wordsworth I cannot let the mistake pass unchallenged. Doubtless many other readers of the Nation have been equally offended by it.

SCHURZ, THE ORATOR AND PATRIOT.—I.

Speeches, Correspondence, and Political Papers of Carl Schurz. Selected and Edited by Frederic Bancroft, on behalf of the Carl Schurz Memorial Committee. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6 vols. $12 net.

It is eminently fitting that the political life of Carl Schurz in this country, as partly told in his own "Reminiscences," and supplemented by Frederic Bancroft and William A. Dunning, in their sketch of his career from 1869 to his death, should now be allowed to unfold itself in an authoritative collection of his principal speeches, a large number of his characteristic letters (sometimes with the replies of his correspondents), and other miscellaneous writings. The material placed in the hands of Mr. Bancroft was abundant. Schurz kept a careful record of all he said or wrote for publication, and the editor has selected with excellent judgment what best illustrates the qualities of the orator and statesman, though it is to be regretted that of the early speeches, delivered between 1858-64, and published in 1865 (now out of print), but four have been retained.

Mr. Bancroft's documents are placed before us in chronological order, with no connecting thread and but few explanatory notes. The first letters, translated from the German, deal with Mr. Schurz's impressions of America shortly after his arrival. Of the extraordinary rapidity with which he mastered the political questions of the day there is proof in his early letters to Gottfried Kinkel, the German poet and professor at Bonn, whose escape from the fortress of Spandau he had so skilfully effected. He enlightens his friend as to the problems that are agitating the country; he speaks of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the Know-Nothing movement, the anti-slavery agitation, and the question of the annexation of Cuba. Though still deeply interested in the affairs of his mother country, American life has taken the strongest hold of him. "I love America," he writes to Kinkel, in 1855. A letter written a year later contains the following striking forecast:

> From now on there can be only two parties in the Union: a Northern and a Southern party—an anti and a pro-slavery party, and at the present moment the Democrats up here are only the outposts of the slave-power in the free States. At last the slavery issue has become the watchword of the day; the time for compromise has passed, and the last chance for a peaceful solution has come. The next four years will decide the fate of the United States; in both camps there is firm determination. We have on our side the spirit of the age, a great inspiring idea and superior ability. The South has unanimity and brutality. I am not sure that this fight can be decided without powder. I doubt it. However, should the force of arms be resorted to as a last measure, the result cannot be doubtful, for the material superiority of the North is immense.

During the Frémont campaign of 1856, Schurz's speeches, in both German and English, delivered in the State of Wisconsin, established his reputation as an orator. His address on "The Irrepressible Conflict," at Chicago (September 25, 1858), stirred the nation to its depths. That remarkable address ought not to have been absent from these volumes. Schurz, the philosophical statesman, was clearly foreshadowed in his campaign speeches of that year. He was naturally attracted by the broad inclusiveness of the ideas of our Western States. In a letter to Gerrit Smith he predicted that the Know-Nothing movement was doomed to failure, and that "the philosophical rather than the radical wing of the Republican party" was destined to obtain control. But he understood the East as he did the West. He paid a magnificent tribute to the early spirit of New England, and appealed to what is best in Anglo-Saxon traditions, in his address on "True Americanism," delivered in Faneuil Hall, April 18, 1859. We catch in his impassioned accents an echo of the superb eloquence of Kossuth, who, seven years previously, had appealed to American liberty in behalf of Hungary on the same spot.

The Presidential campaign of 1860 found in Schurz one of the most ardent and effective supporters of Lincoln, and brought the two men into intimate contact. In a letter written by Lincoln, June 18, in which he heartily approved Schurz's campaign plan, he said: "I beg you to be assured that your having supported Gov. Seward, in preference to myself, in the Convention, is not even remembered by me for any practical purpose, or the slightest unpleasant feeling." A month later Schurz delivered an address at a mass meeting at Springfield, Ill. His impressions of the Presidential candidate on that occasion are thus set down in a letter to Mrs. Schurz, which, precisely because never intended for publication, furnishes an unusually life-like portrait-sketch of Mr. Lincoln (we quote from the translation of the German original):

> I was with Lincoln yesterday. He is the same kindly old fellow, quite as unpretentious and ingenuous as ever. The reception committee had reserved quarters for me at the hotel, and Lincoln was one of the first to knock at my door. He wears a linen sack-coat, and a hat of doubtful age, but his appearance is neat and cleanly. We talked in my room for nearly two hours. I was lying on my bed, resting, when he came, and he insisted on my remaining so. He talked of the Presidential election with as much placid, cheerful frankness as if he were discussing the potato crop. He told me of all the letters and visits with which he was flooded, and said that he was not answering those asking for office and the like. "Men like you," he added, "who have real merit and do the work, are always too proud to ask for anything; those who do nothing are always the most clamorous for office, and very often get it, because it is the only way to get rid of them. But if I am elected, they will find a tough customer to deal with, and you may depend upon it that I shall know how to distinguish deserving men from drones."

Lincoln insisted on accompanying Schurz to the Capitol, and sat directly in front of him. Schurz spoke in both English and German, and when he had finished Lincoln shook hands with him and said: "You are an awful fellow! I understand your power now."

Perhaps the greatest of Schurz's rhetorical triumphs during the campaign was his address on "The Doom of Slavery"—a powerful appeal to the slave-holder—delivered at St. Louis, August 1, 1860. The eloquent young orator was in demand throughout the country. He spoke in Indiana and Pennsylvania, as well as in New York city, cheered everywhere by enthusiastic crowds. After the election Schurz, as he wrote to his wife, was "swamped with letters from office seekers." He confided to her that he had written to

Lincoln, giving his views of the political situation and stating that he would "never submit to a compromise, and would leave the party the moment it abandoned its principles."

Nothing in the volumes before us is historically so important as the evidence that Presidential candidates and Presidents, from Lincoln to Roosevelt, either sought Schurz's advice, or profited by the offered counsel. Schurz's opinions were in every instance dictated by the loftiest patriotism, and even if not invariably correct, his advice heightened the respect of the recipient for the fearless adviser. Lincoln's answer to Schurz's criticism of his slowness as commander-in-chief, and of his persistence in placing Democrats in high military positions, is well known. Lincoln had the best of the argument, but he continued to value Schurz's judgment, just as Schurz learned to appreciate, more and more, Lincoln's wisdom. Writing to a German friend, in October, 1864, Schurz said:

> I have criticised him often and severely, and later I found that he was right. . . . His Administration is the most representative that the history of the world has ever seen. I will make a prophecy that may sound peculiar. In fifty years, perhaps much sooner, Lincoln's name will be inscribed close to Washington's on this American republic's roll of honor. And there it will remain for all time. The children of those who persecute him now will bless him.

Schurz's letters to Andrew Johnson show that their relations were never cordial, though the President was sufficiently impressed with Schurz's personality to send him on a confidential mission to investigate conditions in the Southern States. After his return, the natural antagonism between the two men became more marked. In his memorable address on "The Logical Results of the War," delivered at Philadelphia September 8, 1866, Schurz protested, with all the fervor of his eloquence, against the assumption of certain political leaders that the policy of Andrew Johnson was but another name for the policy of Abraham Lincoln.

Schurz earnestly supported Gen. Grant during the Presidential campaign of 1868, but as the newly elected Senator from Missouri he soon found himself in outspoken opposition to him. In a letter written to Gen. Grant in July, 1870, Schurz referred to the painful change in their relations, owing to their differenees concerning the San Domingo treaty, but he asked for an interview, in order to remove the erroneous impression that he had attacked him personally in the secret session of the Senate:

> When we had our first conversation about the San Domingo Treaty, he wrote, I told you frankly that I was opposed to it on conscientious grounds, and would endeavor to defeat it. When the Senate had closed the first debate on the Treaty, I beseeched you to drop the matter there; that advice sprang from patriotic motives, and subsequent events have demonstrated its judiciousness so clearly that I should not hesitate to repeat it. In fighting the Treaty, I have used all the legitimate means of parliamentary warfare, and, looking back upon my conduct, I have nothing for which I should reproach myself.

Schurz's independence of party ties was never more strikingly manifested than in his attitude in the Greeley campaign. It was this trait of his character which so many of his political adversaries could neither understand nor forgive. He did not conceal his disappointment at Greeley's nomination. "I assure you," he wrote to him, "I did not go to Cincinnati to have anybody in particular nominated, and therefore I do not mourn over the defeat of a favorite. I did not advise your nomination, because I foresaw certain difficulties. But these difficulties have been rendered immeasurably more grave by the manner in which your nomination was brought about." There followed an active interchange of letters between Greeley and Schurz, the former becoming increasingly hopeful, the latter remaining skeptical. Schurz's course after the disastrous result of Greeley's campaign was clear to him. In a letter to Horace White he said: "You ask me what in my opinion should now be done. It is perfectly clear to my mind. We should virtually do the same thing after the reëlection of Grant that we should have done after the election of Greeley. We should continue to struggle for the realization of the ideas embodied in our original programme and be governed by no other consideration."

The relations between Schurz and Rutherford B. Hayes began with a letter in which, shortly after Hayes's nomination for the Presidency, Schurz addressed him "with that confidence and frankness with which one gentleman may speak to another." It would be impossible, he said, to conduct the campaign on the old war issues. "There is at present far more strength, as there is more wisdom and patriotism, in the advocacy of a policy of justice and conciliation than in an attempt to rake up old animosities and in a mere repetition of old cries." Schurz urged that the question of civil serviee reform was "the most seriously sore point of the party." He advised Hayes to "substitute for the vague and discredited promises of a platform the frank and vigorous pledge of a man known to be a man of honor."

Schurz was as candid in his correspondence with Hayes—offering suggestions of his own and criticising what Hayes submitted to him—as he was, four years later, in his dealings with Garfield. "I consider it a duty," he wrote to Garfield after his nomination, "to say to you that your letter of acceptanee has been a great disappointment to very many good men who hailed your nomination with joy and hope. Especially the vagueness of your language on the financial question, and still more the positive abandonment of ground taken, and to a great extent, maintained, by the present Administration with regard to the civil service, have greatly discouraged many who expected to support you with enthusiasm and would have done so with effect."

In season and (as it sometimes seemed to more than one Presidential candidate or President) out of season, Schurz counselled and admonished. To Grover Cleveland he wrote, just before his first inauguration: "The more I think of it the more does it seem to me that your inaugural is a matter of uncommon importance—that it should rise as far as possible above the perfunctory commonplace of such occasions and speak with the voice of leadership to the political forces behind you, to give them impulse and direction." Cleveland had mentioned to him the names of the men he thought of for Cabinet positions, and Schurz freely gave his opinion. Shortly after the inauguration he urged upon the President the desirability of reappointing Postmaster Pearson, of New York city, and in reply to Cleveland's letter on the subject, Schurz wrote: "I hasten to remove a wrong impression which my letter seems to have produced. It is that it 'indicated the wishes of a friend and ally who had a right to insist upon the recognition he asks.' Nothing could be farther from my mind than to insist upon a 'recognition.' The practice of recognizing persons by the use of official trust for political or personal services rendered, is, on the contrary, one of the practices I have frequently denounced as dangerous. What I want to see recognized is not a person but the public interest."

In a letter to President McKinley in October, 1897, occurs a passage which will be read with interest at the present day:

> I trust you have received the suggestions I took the liberty of submitting to you through Mr. McAneny, concerning the supposed interference of your Administration in our municipal election, in the spirit in which they were conceived; and I am exceedingly glad to learn that no such interference on your part is intended. New York municipal politics have always been an extremely dangerous field for any National Administration to venture upon. If Tammany should be successful, the public opinion of the country, as it has already pronounced itself, will doubtless award the responsibility to the Republican machine here; and you can certainly not desire to be involved in the disaster.

The correspondenee between Schurz and Roosevelt (not all of Mr. Roosevelt's replies have been published) discloses many interesting points of contact and contrast between the two men. On December 29, 1903, Schurz writes:

In your letter you refer to the fact that you have occasionally taken the advice of Booker Washington about the appointment to office of colored persons. Pardon me for remarking that, when I found at the time mention of this fact in the newspapers, it caused me some anxiety—not as if I had feared that his advice might not be candid and wise, which it undoubtedly was, but because I thought that Booker Washington was so peculiarly valuable a man, and his mission so important and at the same time so delicate, that he should most carefully be kept free of all contact with politics—especially that part of politics which has to do with patronage. Do you not think so?

CURRENT FICTION.

The Way of Ambition. By Robert Hichens. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co.

It has not often been possible in the past for readers of serious mind to take Mr. Hichens seriously as a writer of fiction. He has always been intense enough about his business, but intensity is not strength, and it is more common to strain at a camel and swallow a gnat than the reverse. There is something mawkish and enervating about his most popular work, and one may have been tempted to trace its popularity to its defects. But this, after all, is rarely true of any work which has sustained its hold on a miscellaneous audience. If "The Garden of Allah" made headway with a certain class of readers by reason of its appeal to prurient taste, it probably conquered its public in general quite as much by virtue of its picturesque or atmospheric quality. His Orient was what Occidental dreams are made on—the dreams of the "average man," or, more probably, the average woman. His Garden has been easily transferred to the stage.

In his present story Mr. Hichens has gone beyond his ordinary theme of the sex situation. He has retained, in some degree, the favorite atmosphere, since part of the action takes place in Algiers. But the problem is primarily not that of East and West, or of man and woman, but of the artist and his work. Claude Heath is a young English composer of austere ideals and practice. Though approaching his thirties, he has attempted to publish nothing. He is conscious of a strain of weakness, a desire to give others what they demand of him, and deliberately guards himself from temptation by living as a recluse. He becomes known, however, to one or two connoisseurs in music, and through them his acquaintance is extended. He meets a widow, Mrs. Mansfield, and her daughter Charmian. The mother is thoroughly in sympathy with his aims and his work, but the daughter, worshipping "success," cannot understand either. Still she feels that there is something great in him, and succeeds in marrying him. Through her he is led to turn away from his ideals and try for popularity. The opera which results is a failure because it lacks sincerity, and when we leave him he is roused to a sense of his infidelity to his real self, and determined to live once more his own life. The rôles of Heath and Charmian are too strongly marked, the former too much a weakling, the latter too much a fool, to command the sympathy of which the situation is capable. Several of the minor figures, Mrs. Mansfield, Susan Fleet, Crayford, the American manager, are far more credible. But certainly in this book Mr. Hichens has gone further than heretofore in the direction of straightforward interpretation; and for the most part he has avoided the lure of the purple passage.

Round the Corner. By Gilbert Cannan. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

"Being of such a strange temper and vision," says Mr. Cannan, "that when I aim my pen at a man I am as likely as not to hit his grandfather, I have in this instance endeavored to forestall the treachery of my faculties and to go straight for the grandfather." That grandfather is Francis Folyat, Bachelor of Divinity and father of a large family, an admirable old man. We have had a glimpse of him (by another name) in Mr. Cannan's preceding novel, "Little Brother," and we are likely to hear of him again, for his—grandson, we almost said—his creator, is very happy in portraits of hale and philosophic old age. But even the smiling optimism of the Rev. Francis Folyat is scarcely proof against the smoke of, say, Manchester. Whenever you see a blot of darkness as you fly, declared the late aviator, Cody, you know you are over a town. The smoke and ugliness of "our town" all but withered the wholesome juices of the good clergyman's frame. He left the soft airs of Cornwall with his many children in the hope that his daughters would find husbands; he left "our town" in the twilight of his life, taking back to his Cornish garden little except a pair of patient, good-humored eyes. For in "our town" ugliness is unmitigated and life is never fully realized; always, it is "round the corner." "Rapacity made this town what it is," observes one of the characters. "Think what it might have been, what all towns might have been, if love had made them!"

Mr. Cannan lifts the curtain upon a crowd of people, and gradually, naturally, each one drifts down stage to the footlights of our attention. Serge and Minna, Frederic and Gertrude, the Lawries and their son, the impassioned acolyte, we shall not lightly forget. Fear and unfriendliness are perpetual non-paying guests in this, and, according to Mr. Cannan, in every middle-class house, but somehow life triumphs after all. If Frederic is weak, his vagabond brother Serge returns from South Africa and Ceylon (Mr. Cannan has a passion for those places) full of ripe, warm wisdom; if Minna marries for convenience, her little sister Annette seizes love with both hands even amid the smoke and grime of that appalling industrialism. Mr. Cannan preaches no sermon, but the uneasiness and unrest of present-day England are in his book.

Father Gregory; or, Lures and Failures. A Tale of Hindostan. By Percival Christopher Wren. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Not long ago we had occasion to notice a series of odd tales grouped under the title "Dew and Mildew." They were further described as "semi-detached stories," a label appropriate to the present collection also. They are strung together by a single thread, that of consequence. "How great a matter a little fire kindleth" may be taken as Mr. Wren's motto. His imagination is both aroused and confined by the sense of minute cause and endless effect. The events in "Dew and Mildew" sprang from the curse of a fakir. If John Durham had not forgotten his intention to shoot a wretched pariah-dog, his son would not have been born in a madhouse, and the Chotapettah Club would never have been founded. John Durham's son is founder and manager of the club. Himself a victim of circumstance, a horn outcast by reason of his illegitimacy, he determines to found a club for men of good birth who have failed—"a harbor," as one of its members calls it, "for first-class hulks; a home for lost, strayed, stolen, and starving dogs of good pedigree; an almshouse for decayed (and rotten) gentlemen." It harbors broken soldiers, civil service men, men of all the learned professions. It is an almshouse only for those who choose to make it so. There is a free list, but a paying list also for such as have been able, in some measure, to "come back." The book is made up of the stories of these failures, and of the diverse lures to which they have succumbed. Father Gregory is the good angel of the club, its spirit and inspiration, as Durham is its mind and practical stay. He has a story of his own, which remains untold. There is more than a touch of the grewsome in these tales, as in the former collection; and the author's contempt for the native character and for the attempts of the Government to foist a European culture upon an Asiatic people is again vigorously expressed.

Discovering Evelina. By F. Frankfort Moore. New York: George H. Doran Co.

In "The Jessamy Bride" Mr. Moore made a love-story for Goldsmith out of the vague traditions connected with the beautiful Miss Horneck. Here he invents a romance for Fanny Burney. The invention seems to be based on a passage in one of her letters to "Daddy Crisp" in which she raves girlishly about the beauty and charm of Rauzzini, a young Italian tenor who was then the idol of London, and who had come to one of Dr. Burney's Sunday afternoons. Daddy Crisp rallied her on her enthusiasm, and there, apparently, was an end of the matter. But the hint is enough for a person bent upon finding a love story in Miss Burney's early life. She is here represented as the Cinderella of the Burney family, a child to be condescended to, for her shyness and her lack of musical accomplishment. She has copied out Dr. Burney's great "History of Music," and is known to be fond of scribbling; but nobody attaches any importance to the habit. When the narrative begins, she has already written "Evelina" and it is now printing; but no one knows of her guilt but a dull cousin who acts as go-between with the unsuspecting publisher. The story of the novel's amazing success and the still more amazing discovery of its authorship is told with some skill. Garrick is shown at his mimicry, Mrs. Thrale at her task of bear-leader, Dr. Johnson in his rôle of playful patron. But what possible need was there of going to all this trouble? If any tale has been told well and for all time, it is this very tale (without the artificial injection of a "heart-interest"), in that imperishable classic, the earlier diary of "little Miss Burney."

ROME.

Companion to Roman History. By H. Stuart Jones, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. With illustrations. The Clarendon Press. New York: Henry Frowde. $5 net.

The Grandeur that Was Rome: A Survey of Roman Culture and Civilization by J. C. Stobart, M.A., late Lecturer in History, Trinity College, Cambridge. London: Sidgwick & Jackson. 30 shillings net.

The expression "companion to Roman history" is perhaps indefinite enough to cover almost any collection of essays on miscellaneous phases of Roman civilization, but as a title of a volume by Mr. H. Stuart Jones, it is likely to create expectations which the contents do not warrant. Of the eight chapters into which the material is divided, that on Roman architecture fills about one-third of the entire volume, beginning with materials and methods of construction and considering successively the various forms to which the genius of the architect, native or imported, was applied. "Artistically speaking," Mr. Jones says, "the triumphs of the Roman architects are to be sought in the 'symphonies in space' which their interiors present; the exterior of these colossal buildings makes no such appeal either to the æsthetic sense or to the intellect as the Greek temple." And again: "Although the genius of the Romans was triumphantly shown in the solution of constructive problems, which carried them even further from the rigid simplicity of Greek architecture towards the subtler equilibrium of opposing stresses, and their artistic handling of space is perhaps unsurpassed, they failed to grasp the true principle of decoration, viz., that it should emphasize and not obscure structural function." These two passages suggest sufficiently the kind and extent of credit which the author is disposed to give to Roman architecture as apart from the Greek.

In art, as in architecture, Mr. Jones is willing to concede to the Romans certain worthy traits of their own, in spite of the fact that they "were long content to plunder rather than to produce." He admits the difficulty of determining what proportion of the individuals who satisfied the Roman demand for works of art were of Italian origin; but, in spite of the known fact that the artists of the Augustan age were mainly Greeks, he maintains that the history of Imperial art as a whole is that of the emergence of qualities foreign to the Hellenic world and subversive of Hellenic standards of taste. "It is a fresh artistic tradition which establishes itself, having its roots in Italian soil (as the history of Etruscan art shows) and continuing unbroken until the Renaissance."

War, religion, production and distribution, and public amusements are each treated in a separate chapter, war receiving about twice the amount of space assigned to any of the others. The proof-reading has not been as accurate as could be wished. "Sano" for Semo has slipped through on page 71, and on page 105 the date of the burning of the Basilica Æmilia stands as 14 A. D. instead of 14 B. C. On page 270 the reference to "Plate" 50 should be to figure 50, and on page 279 the ashes of "unburnt" calves stored for use as a fertility-charm should, of course, be ashes of unborn calves. "Phrases" stands for phases on page 384. Mr. Jones is sometimes censurably careless in his use of English, though perhaps he might set up the defence that we are now living under an "initiated" law of general amnesty for crimes of that sort. On the whole, the "Companion to Latin Studies," edited by Dr. J. E. Sandys for the Cambridge University Press, much better fulfils the expectations aroused by Mr. Jones's title, in spite of the fact that all the evil genii of the ancient world seem to have conspired in the concoction of Dr. Sandys's exasperating quadripartite index.

"The Grandeur that Was Rome," by Mr. Stobart, will call the mind of the classically educated reader back to Quintilian's characterization of Seneca as "worthy to be read for this if for no other reason, that he can train the judgment in both directions. For there are many things to be approved in him, many even worthy of admiration, provided there be care in selection." To Mr. Stobart's mind, Rome has been too long the playground of satirists and pessimists. There never was any "decline and fall." The whole career was one of progress—progress when the republic passed into the empire, and progress again when the artificial ramparts on the Rhine and Danube broke down and let the new nations into their inheritance. He admits that it is hard to shake the popular verdict and get Roman history read in the new light. "To do so you cannot follow the authorities, for they were all on the side of deterioration. The idea of progress was unknown to the ancient world, and above all others the Romans believed their Golden Age was behind them."

After starting by discrediting all the authorities en masse, Mr. Stobart might have used the carte blanche thus acquired to give us out of his own cogitations a really consistent Rome, free from all exasperating problems. One finds him, however, continually admitting from those tainted sources the same old stories which have convinced people in the past that Rome really did decline. Perhaps what we need is a little sharper definition of what different people mean by the terms progress and decline. For the Roman Republic, Mr. Stobart strains a vigorous vocabulary to the limit to express his detestation. The old Roman virtue simply never existed. Admitting, though it is somewhat out of harmony with his main thesis, that evil tendencies did grow rapidly in Republican times, he does not find the cause in the softening effect of Greek influences. If these influences had come earlier, the picture might have been less dark. "It was their starved souls, empty of ideals, devoid even of reasonable occupation for their leisure or harmless use for their wealth, which rendered the aristocracy of Rome so utterly vulgar and debased." But out of the sink of picturesquely varied iniquities which constituted the republic sprang an empire for which Mr. Stobart cannot find praises too high. "The republic that sucked the blood of her provinces is detestable to all right-thinking men. The autocracy that cleared out the canals in Egypt, planted flax and encouraged pottery in Gaul, irrigated Africa and taught agriculture to the Moorish nomads, set the wild Iberians to mining and weaving, built aqueducts and roads everywhere, established a postal system and policed land and sea so effectively that a man might fare from York to Palmyra, or from Trier to Morocco 'with his bosom full of gold,' may be tyranny governing in its own interests, but it is an institution for which the world has every reason to be grateful."

The author passes along the view which one meets every now and then that the younger Pliny, in his correspondence, pictures a Rome wholly inconsistent with that of the writings of Tacitus. The purpose of Pliny in his letters naturally led to a "picture of tranquil and cultivated leisure or of useful activity carried on in refined and elegant surroundings," but Mr. Stobart or any one else who has not found in those letters a full realization of the horrors of imperial rule under a Nero or a Domitian simply has not read them. The reference to Pliny is followed by a page of admissions sufficient to bolster up a Juvenal himself, "but one misconception," we are told, "must be combated. The whole imperial period of five centuries should not be regarded as one slippery Gadarene slope down which the Romans were hurrying to destruction." Yes, but Mr. Stobart has not told this either first or most effectively. For more than fifty years, scholars in various lands have been working towards a truer conception of Imperial Rome, both in its virtues and in its excesses, and the best progress has been made not by tossing aside the original authorities as worthless, but by more accurately reading and interpreting them. Mr. Stobart is too violent in his prejudices, whether for or against, and too unguarded in his language, to serve well the interests of the careful seeker after truth.

The Life of Octavia Hill. Edited by C. Edmund Maurice. New York: The Macmillan Co. $5 net.

Octavia Hill was born in 1838 and died only last summer. For half a century she was one of the most benignant and beneficent figures in English society. The present volume is made up chiefly of letters to, from, and about Miss Hill. Their editor, a connection by marriage, received his commission from her, and has done his work with skill and discretion. He professes to have made but slight original contribution to the book. The explanations which link the letters he has had printed in smaller type than the letters themselves; and their substance is mainly derived from the statements of others. He was, however, associated with Miss Hill's work for some ten years, and admits that his comments covering that period may amount to something. For the rest, the selection of such a group of letters is in itself an art, especially when many of them are printed fragmentarily. With such a method, it is possible to produce a variety of effects. Mr. Maurice frankly admits that his purpose has been "to emphasize the human and family sympathy" which belonged to Miss Hill, rather than her remarkable business ability. The danger with her, he says, is the reverse of that which has threatened the memory of Florence Nightingale. The sentimental popular conception of the "lady with the lamp" has obscured Miss Nightingale's powers of organization and administration. The general sense of those powers in Miss Hill has almost hidden the fact that the basis of her work lay in feeling quite as much as in reason.

Certainly, the letters here printed give the impression of an ardent, affectionate, enthusiastic woman who, with all her interests and activities, remained always a lover of life and of living things. The joys and satisfactions of every-day experience are continually dwelt upon. She "thinks thankfully of all people's kindness"; she is "quietly, splendidly happy." "Joy" is a favorite word in the later as well as the earlier letters. "It is on loving, infinitely more than on being loved, that happiness depends," is a phrase in a letter written at eighteen, which might be taken to have been the working motto of a nature which depended greatly, after all, on being loved.

An interesting series by themselves might have been made of the letters connected with the early relation of Miss Hill and Ruskin. In the early fifties Octavia's mother had become manager of a "Ladies' Guild" in London, an early experiment in the sort of industrial philanthropy to which the daughter was to devote so much of her life. Dissensions arose, and the Guild failed, whereupon Octavia applied to Ruskin with the ingenuous object of finding out whether there was any use in her trying to paint for a living. He discovered talent in her, and she became, in a way, his pupil, as well as his disciple in the larger sense. Other great men of the day, notably Kingsley and F. D. Maurice, had made their impression upon her, but it was Ruskin who really became her inspiration. For years he was her guide also; but it was impossible that this relation should endure. Differences and even estrangement arose, the practical work to which she gave herself seemed to him misdirected and even wasted. "My question, a very vital one," he writes in 1876, "is, whether it really never enters your mind at all that all measures of amelioration in great cities . . . may be in reality only encouragements to the great Evil Doers in their daily accumulating sin?" And one of Miss Hill's latest letters speaks of Ruskin's political economy as of comparatively little moment compared with his "art work."

In the value of her own labors Miss Hill had unflagging belief. The problem of the proper housing and employment of the poor never ceased to be the important problem for her. As for methods, she recognized that they must shift with conditions, and, at the end, expressed the hope that those who carried on her work would maintain its spirit without being bound to continue its policy. As summing up her point of view, Mr. Maurice quotes with approval the judgment of a contemporary: "She brought the force of religion into the cause of wisdom, and gave emotion to justice."

Histoire des Séleucides (323—64 avant J.-C.), par A. Bouché-Leclercq. Paris: Leroux.

The Greek classics were in the main produced before the Macedonian age. Though the Macedonians always regarded themselves as Hellenes, Demosthenes, whose voice reached much farther than theirs, chose to call them barbarians. Mommsen, with authority closely approximating to tyranny, made the public institutions of the Romans the product of a purely Italian development. These circumstances, together with the fact that ancient history, until recently at least, was studied, not for itself and because of its own interest and value, but primarily because of the light it threw upon the literature of Greece and Rome, explain why a period so vibrant with human action as is that which Alexander the Great's conquest of Asia ushered in has been so long in coming into its due.

A decade or two ago things changed. Droysen's gallant and fortunate enterprise and Mahaffy's filibustering expeditions then gave way to the regular advance of the army of historians. How fiercely the attack is pushed home today may be gauged by the appearance in the early months of 1913 of two first-rate works in this field, the "Antigonus Gonatas" of Mr. W. W. Tarn and the book now under review.

The serious student of history is well aware that he has to do ordinarily with two classes of histories. The author of a work of the first class, on publishing his book, is prepared to make an affidavit that, to the best of his knowledge and ability, every sentence is the last word that can be said on the subject at the moment. He may write well or he may write badly; he may have imagination and historic sense, or he may lack them; and his work will be great or mediocre accordingly. Insignificant, however, it cannot be in any case. In the other class the author is indifferent to fine nuances of opinion and report. What does it matter whether an event happened in one year or the next? He glides smoothly over the problems that are agitating specialists. He seizes hold of the obvious materials and paraphrases his sources rapidly. He may even ignore the primary authorities altogether. Such a writer can achieve a notable success, but it is bound to be a transient one.

M. Bouché-Leclercq belongs to the first class of authors. His "Astrologie grecque" and his "Histoire des Lagides" have won him an honored place among ancient historians; and it is probable that had his "Histoire des Séleucides" been published when it was composed—some twenty-five years ago—it would have commanded the immediate attention of scholars. But "mon labeur n'aboutit alors," says M. Bouché-Leclercq, "qua'à esquisser un texte vague, flottant sur un amas de notes plus ou moins justificatives." It is this text, however, made over to attract "d'autres lecteurs que les érudits," that we now receive: the notes and discussions are reserved for a second volume, which is cannily held back that it may take account of slips and defects noted in the first. There is a possibility that the second volume will be a large book. M. Bouché-Leclercq is not wholly blameless if that proves to be the case. For he has left out of account so many pertinent materials—the yield of the Athenian and Delian inscriptions, for example—he has ignored completely topics of such first-rate importance—the land system of the Seleucids, for example—and he has made himself responsible for so many new or old errors, which we cannot enumerate here, that we have had some doubt whether his "Histoire des Séleucides" did not really belong to the second class of histories of which we have given the characteristics.

The fact seems to be that M. Bouché-Leclercq has not added much to the stock of primary and secondary authorities for the Hellenistic age which he used for his history of the Ptolemics. His work is, accordingly, some seven or eight years old at its birth. Its chief merit is its attractive literary form. It may do a real service to French readers, to whom no connected history of the Macedonian lords and ladies in Asia has been accessible hitherto. The English reader will find it no improvement on Bevan's "House of Seleucus." The scholar will continue to make the histories of Beloch, Niese, and Schürer his fundamental works.

To Mesopotamia and Kurdistan in Disguise. By E. B. Soane. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $4 net.

Of all recent accounts of travel and description, this record of a journey from Beirut to Bagdad is one not merely of the most fascinating, but also one of the most valuable. Numerous works have been written, it is true, concerning the regions here considered, but none has previously appeared—at least to the reviewer's knowledge—which can pretend to set forth Kurdish life from the native point of view. This is here done; and it has been rendered possible by the fact that Mr. Soane is so thoroughly versed in both Persian and Kurdish that he passed for a native. During a previous sojourn in Persia he had made profession of Islam and taken a course of theological study, so that he was able to defend Shia doctrines with all the energy of the Persian true believer, thus rendering his disguise doubly impenetrable.

The author's power of vivid description comes to the fore in his account of his voyage down the Tigris from Diarbekr to Mosul; but of even more real value is his picture of daily life in such Kurdish cities as Kirkuk, Halabja, and Sulaimania, in the last-named of which he engaged for a time in mercantile pursuits. While still at Stambul, moreover, he was enabled to discover the Persian opinion of the Turkish Parliament, which, though unflattering, is probably correct—the Oriental, as may be gathered from many a passage in Mr. Soane's book, is as yet scarcely ready for the Occidental forms of government.

Mr. Soane has the chief of all requisites of the traveller—love for the people among whom he sojourns, and liking for their mode of life; he has, indeed, some of the characteristics of a Borrow. The Kurdish character, as he sketches it, is highly attractive, and is comparable, as has been noted by others, to that of the Scottish Highlanders a few centuries ago. The contrast between the brave, hospitable, loyal Kurd and the Turkish official is only too marked. The bad character of the Turkish officials is equalled, in the author's opinion, only by that of the native Christians, although he excepts from this unflattering category the Chaldean Christians. The question of Asiatic Christianity unfortunately leads him to criticisms of Roman Catholic activity in Mesopotamia which seem to savor of strong personal bias against that religion, and which, together with some foolish and quite irrelevant remarks upon the Biblical account of Jonah, form almost the only unpleasant feature of the volume.

For his historical sources the author has drawn upon oral tradition, but in his choice of reference books he has not been altogether fortunate. There is, for instance, an undue reliance upon the "Assyria" of Ragozin (whom the author seems to believe to have been a man); and the total absence of all allusions to German researches upon the language and history of the Kurds is most regrettable—scholars like Justi, Socin, Lerch, and Mann, to mention only a few names, are far too important to be ignored. In his account of the Yezidis, or "Devil-Worshippers," he might well have profited by the researches of investigators like J. Ménant; and his historical sketches of Urfa (the ancient Edessa) and Erbil (the ancient Arbela) are rather meagre. He also exaggerates the friendship of Sasanian Persia for Christianity—relatively slight acquaintance with the Pahlavi, and especially with the Syriac sources of the period, would show him that such friendship was manifested by only a few monarchs, and that the general attitude of Sasanian kings was one of bitter hostility to all Christians. It is, therefore, a pity that he did not consult some such treatise as Labourt's "Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide."

Real value attaches to the account, which is all too brief, of the doctrines of the Ali Illahi sect found among the Guran Kurds. The interesting hypothesis is advanced by Mr. Soane that the Mukri dialect of Kurdish is the closest modern representative of the ancient Avesta, though the view more commonly accepted assigns this place to Afghan. He regards the Kurds as the descendants of the Medes, and traces their lineage to the Carduchi of Xenophon's "Anabasis," the Nairi of the Assyrian inscriptions, and the inhabitants of the land which the classics call Gordyene. The accuracy of a number of these hypotheses is not beyond question. Yet this detracts little from the value of his book, which is authoritative on its main subject. For a man of his exceptional qualifications there are many tasks still to be done. May we hope for some formal grammar of the Kurdish dialects of which he is master, and which are still so imperfectly known? Could he not became an Ali Illahi and study the syncretism of this curious sect? Might he not turn Sunni and visit Afghanistan and Baluchistan, to do for us—and for them—the service that he has just performed for Kurdistan?

T. Fisher Unwin announces a new novel by Irene Burn, with the title "The Unforgiving Minute," depicting the everyday life of the Englishman in India, and also the "Further Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer," by W. C. Scully, a continuation, from 1876, of the work published last spring.

The 109th annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society is an unprecedented record of both income and circulation. Bibles to the number of 7,899,562 in 450 languages and dialects, ten new versions having been added during the year, were distributed. The accounts of the many and varied adventures of the colporteurs make interesting reading.

The whole of the National Geographic Magazine for September is devoted to Ancient Egypt. The principal facts, historical and biographical, brought to light by recent investigations are given by the Rev. James Baikie, and these enable one, with the aid of seventy-four illustrations, to get many vivid impressions of the life of those times. A new chapter in the history of bird worship and protection is opened by the discovery a few months ago by one of the excavators of the Egyptian Exploration Fund of a sacred ibis cemetery, 2,700 square feet in extent, at Abydos. The birds were as carefully mummified as the royal personages. Their beneficence in destroying the enemies of the growing crops led to their being worshipped as divine.

The Geographical Journal for September contains the conclusion of Dr. J. F. Unstead's statistical study of wheat cultivation and trade, 1881-1910, of which the last table is a summary of the world production. The increase in thirty years was a billion bushels, due mainly to an increased acreage, but to some extent to an increased average yield per acre. Europe still produces more than half the crop, European Russia showing the greatest increase, from 244 million bushels to 461 million bushels. There was considerable difficulty in procuring trustworthy statistics of the United States on account of the different returns of the Department of Agriculture and the Census Bureau. For the year 1909, for instance, the Department reported 737 million bushels, but the Bureau only 683 million. Among the other contents are a physiographical description of the Middle Clarence valley of New Zealand and an account of a remarkable Japanese who made the first survey of his country. A brewer of saké, he was so enamoured of the art of surveying that between the years 1800 and 1818, with instruments of his own construction, a quadrant, an azimuth instrument, and a compass, he made maps so good that they were adopted as the basis of the more recent trigonometrical survey of Japan.

Prof. George Saintsbury is always a charming friend and sure guide in his introductions to various editions of Thackeray and Jane Austen and other writers of fiction, and one turns with high expectations of pleasure to his new volume on "The English Novel" in the Channels of English Literature series (Dutton). But the expectations are barely fulfilled. Of reading for the task undertaken Professor Saintsbury, as he himself would tell us if it were not otherwise abundantly evident, has a mighty sufficiency. One is sure that no obscure novel of the eighteenth century is named which the critic has not read and noted. Furthermore, as the criticism of fiction is chiefly a matter of immediate gusto and not of philosophic reflection, the judgments of Professor Saintsbury in this field are almost invariably sound. "The proof of the art of the novelist," he contends, "is that—at first hand or very shortly—he 'enfists,' absorbs, delights you"; and no one is more immediately enfisted, absorbed, and delighted by a good story or a good style than the writer of this book. Professor Saintsbury makes strong reservations in praising Meredith—and he is demonstrably right. Some will object to the emphasis laid by him on Dickens's "little literature" and inability to enter into "communion with certain orders of society and classes of human creatures"—but again he is right. Of Thackeray we already know Professor Saintsbury's opinion; no one, not even Mr. Brownell, has praised the great Victorian with more knowledge and more seductive entrain. He is a doughty champion for Thackeray and the English school against Balzac and the Russian novelists, and his animadversions on this topic are worthy of reading and digesting.

We are most in doubt of Professor Saintsbury's sanity of judgment when he deals with the great protagonists, Richardson and Fielding. In exalting the latter at the expense of the former he seems never to have felt the tremendously tragic effects of the last quarter of "Clarissa," and seems, by a sort of wilful perversion, to exaggerate the merits of "Pamela," as this offers so ready a means of glorifying Fielding through "Joseph Andrews." On the other hand, he says not a word to indicate the wordiness and flatness of a good deal of Fielding's superfluous moralizing. However, though Dr. Johnson would be on our side, there are some who will stand with the professor of Edinburgh. There are very few, we think, who will not be revolted by the loose and ungainly ease of Professor Saintsbury's style. And on the whole, though his attitude is generally right towards the novelists passed in review, the book contains little that is memorable and quite misses the deeper currents of life and thought of which fiction is, so to speak, the surface indication.

Mr. James Huneker has put forth a fresh volume of essays, sketches, and jottings called "The Pathos of Distance, a Book of a Thousand and One Moments" (Scribner). The sub-title honestly disclaims any attempt at unity of matter or point of view, and one may as honestly acknowledge the impossibility of reporting any definite impression of the book. Here is an original portrait of Villiers de l'Isle Adam somewhat in the manner of George Moore, a considerable amount of lively chat about George Moore himself and his recent books, much gossip of Wagner and Nietzsche based on the autobiography, tolerably circumspect consideration of "Matisse, Picasso, and Others," flittings among art galleries, more "browsings" among books, respects to the Neo-Celts, and a rather extended sally among the pragmatic philosophers. To the charge that he offers no "general ideas," Mr. Huneker blandly replies that he does not believe in them; which in turn will recall to some readers a famous pronouncement on Goldsmith: "Sir, he knows nothing; he has made up his mind about nothing." The application is perhaps unjust. Mr. Huneker knows how to talk lightly, tartly, cleverly, and with an air of ancient familiarity on an abundance of topics. But he is a professional skeptic, seeking disdainfully, "in a world full of futile sounds and gestures," a new taste with a temporary relish for the slightly cloyed palate of the order Lepidoptera. We would only say, therefore, that the impressionist who desires to produce a permanent impression should somehow contrive to throw into his work just a "shade more soul."

Among the many books dealing with the construction of the new canal, Mr. Joseph Bucklin Bishop's "Panama Gateway" (Scribner) should stand out as an authoritative account of the great enterprise. He has been associated with the work since it began, and as secretary of the Isthmian Canal Commission has undoubtedly enjoyed sources of information available to no other writer. Few, if any, details, not to speak of figures, have escaped him, and the result is a complete survey of the project. Beginning with the history of Panama and the futile search of ancient explorers for a passage through the continent, Mr. Bishop recounts the early steps taken by individuals and the United States Government with the view of providing an interoceanic canal to be controlled by this country. Then came the building of the Panama Railroad by American capitalists, and after that the effort and failure of Ferdinand de Lesseps, builder of the Suez Canal, to dig a waterway through pestilential jungle and morass. Mr. Bishop speaks highly of the courage and intelligence of the Frenchmen, who were "led to pitiful disaster by incompetent and unworthy commanders." Lesseps he regards as a man whose head was so completely turned by his success at Suez that he brushed aside the advice of trained engineers and failed to consider the obstacles that presented themselves. There is a vivid picture of the corruption and extravagance that brought financial disaster, while the shadow of death by yellow fever lurked everywhere. Incidentally, Mr. Bishop holds that public sentiment in the United States would not have permitted the building of the canal at the cost of great loss of life, and he says that the work was made possible by the devotion of Reed, Carroll, and Lazear, the three physicians who in Cuba proved that the stegomyia mosquito was the transmitter of yellow fever. Passing to the negotiations with Colombia for a treaty enabling the United States to build and control the waterway, the author describes the overnight Panama revolution and absolves the Washington Government of complicity in the plans of the revolutionists, while admitting that Washington was well aware of what was going on. To President Roosevelt much credit is given for his energy in connection with the determination of the type of canal, and for turning aside the flood of hostile criticism with which the work was assailed in the beginning. A large part of the book is devoted to the period of construction, and the methods of sanitation and administration. "Not a shadow of scandal hovers over the task as the end approaches," writes Mr. Bishop, "nor is there audible the faintest whisper of 'graft' in connection with it." One valuable chapter describes the completed canal, and the measures which will be taken to safeguard the locks while ships are passed through. There are numerous illustrations and a map.

The people whom Mr. Robert H. Milligan describes in his "Fetish Folk of West Africa" (Revell) live in the Gahun Colony of what was formerly called the French Congo, but is now officially known as French Equatorial Africa. They are divided into two Bantu tribes, the Mpongwe living in the coastland, and the "cannibal" Fang, who have for many years been coming from the far interior, "burning, killing, and even eating their way through the older coast tribes." The greater part of the book is devoted to an account of the latter, as most of the author's work was done among them. The main object is to give an impression of the "humanity" of the African, his mental habits, and beliefs. So, while the purely savage side of his life is vividly described, stress is laid upon his many good qualities. The love of his mother, for instance, is the deepest emotion of his heart and his best moral quality, and his most poignant grief is the loss of his children. Boys were the most trustworthy and affectionate of companions, and they were neither dull nor lacking in humor. "I have never known an American school in which there was better order and so little exercise of discipline as in my African school." Noticeable is the African's devotion to music. Singing not only his joy, but his grief; not only his love, but his anger, revenge, and despair, he may be rightfully regarded as the most musical person living.

The chief obstacle to the African's rising above his savage condition is his bondage to fetishism or charms and witchcraft. This causes mutual distrust, for he does not believe there is any such thing as a natural death. When any one dies the witch-doctor is immediately called on to name the guilty person, who is killed. Cannibalism is the last desperate resort of fear. To eat one of his enemies in war is the strongest possible protection against them. His most powerful and sacred fetish is the skull of his father, so that "here fetishism becomes ancestor-worship." Most of the illustrations of this bondage are drawn from the author's own experiences while doing missionary work among them. He concludes a valuable account of the natives in their primitive condition with showing what Christian teaching has done for them and answering the objections of travellers, and especially Miss Mary Kingsley, to mission work. The eighteen illustrations are reproductions of photographs, but we regret that in a work containing so much valuable information there is no index.

It scarcely needs a long and formal introduction to give Lord Milner's addresses, collected in "The Nation and the Empire" (Houghton Mifflin), an outward unity, so clearly are all concerned with British imperialism, its problems, and its opportunities. At the same time, the inclusion of Lord Milner's speeches during his tenure of office as High Commissioner of South Africa, at the time of the Boer War, with later addresses in the British Isles and Canada, down to the present year, bespeaks a certain historical variety. The chief interest of the book is likely to be in its unconscious tracing of the gradual growth of a serviceable conception of an Imperial union. It is Lord Milner's oft-repeated hope that some day there may exist an imperial Constitution, as a formal instrument, "providing for the separation of those branches of public business which, like Foreign Affairs, Defence, and Ocean Communications, are essentially Imperial." In this Imperialism he sees something wider than Anglo-Saxondom—the power of incorporating alien races, without trying to disintegrate them, or rob them of their individuality, into an organized Pax Britannica that would join together Dutch of South Africa, French of Canada, and Hindus of East India.

The appearance of the first volume of a critical history of Roman comedy by a distinguished French scholar ("Histoire de la Comédie romaine," par G. Michaut, Vol. I, Sur les Tréteaux latins; Paris: Fontemoing et Cie.) is a literary event of more than usual importance. The beginnings of this department of Latin literature are more obscure and uncertain than those of any other department, and during the last twenty years have occupied the greater part of the attention of Latin students. Hence a critical résumé of the various theories and counter-theories which have been put forth in such numbers during this period has come to be a necessity. The author is favorably known by his careful study of Roman character ("Le Génie latin"; Paris, 1900), and he shows himself a most exact and lucid student of his subject in the present book. His method is to study the evidence of the ancients themselves, both independently and in the light of the interpretations set forth by other scholars. To do this he has made himself familiar with almost everything that has appeared in France and Germany, and his summaries and discussions of these various views are of great value. But he is not so much at home in English and American work. Of the former there has been very little, but especially in the last five years American scholars have been very busy. Strangely enough, although this volume was issued in 1912, the work itself seems to have been completed much earlier, for there is no reference to anything later than 1907, and but little later than 1904.

M. Michaut writes a vigorous and vivacious style, which renders him interesting even in his most minute criticisms. In temperament he is on the one hand a skeptic of almost every conclusion thus far reached by classical scholars, as on the other he is inclined to regard the Greek influence on Latin literature and criticism as rather more important than many recent critics have held. In his introductory chapter on Les Romains et la Comédie M. Michaut maintains that the characteristics traditionally ascribed to the Romans of severity, sternness, and dignity, were in reality only assumed for public occasions, while the genuine Roman, like the Italian, was a frolicsome creature, given to games, dances, and rough plays of a dramatic type, as is shown by such ancient rituals as those of the Arval brothers, and those concerned with the harvest and the vintage. Hence comedy instead of being a foreign innovation was innate in the Roman character and life, and would have developed naturally but for the Greek invasion. In all this he is unquestionably right.

Then follow various chapters on the Satura, the Atellana, the Palliata, the Mime, with a final chapter on the Roman Theatre. In regard to the theatre, we have more ancient material, but the interpretation of much of it is by no means assured. In the earlier chapters the greater part of the discussion goes back to Livy's famous account of the introduction of actors into Rome. All show acute criticism and suggestion, where imagination is held strictly within the bounds of common sense, a practice which many Germans would do well to imitate. The chapters open to most criticism are those on the Satura. M. Michaut believes that the so-called Dramatic-Satura inferred from Livy's sketch never existed, but that Livy's account was a fantastic attempt to parallel the Greek development. He is, however, inclined to think that there was an underlying basis of fact in that the rustic improvisations of youthful free Romans must have ultimately received a more regular treatment, and thus constituted the Satura referred to. In this chapter he discusses sympathetically Professor Hendrickson's two papers in the American Journal of Philology in 1894 and 1898, but seems to be ignorant of the fact that in the last few years there have been articles on the same subject by at least five American scholars, including another by Professor Hendrickson himself. Recent literature up to 1912 is given in an article in the American Journal of Philology for April, 1912.

Prof. Lano Cooper has done a useful piece of work in his "amplified version" of Aristotle's "Poetics" (Ginn). The book is intended primarily for students of English, but the many illustrations taken from English authors are likely to be valuable to students of the classics as well, for they direct attention in an interesting way to the fundamental and universal character of the Greek treatise. Thorough students of English ought to know the "Poetics" at first hand, but if our present tendencies to work along lines of least resistance preclude this, they will hardly find a better guide than Professor Cooper has furnished them. His method is to give a free translation, and then to add, unseparated from the general text, but in brackets, a miscellaneous commentary. Occasionally a little of what might well be commentary gets into the text, as when in the first chapter the essential quality or function of each species of poetic art is said to be "equivalent to the proper and characteristic effect of each on the trained sensibilities of the judicious"—good Aristotelian doctrine, no doubt, but foreign to the Greek of this passage. In the main, however, the author has made his translation follow the original without undue explanatory interpolation, and has constructed his commentary with good sense and tact. He has made careful use of Bywater's almost final edition of the "Poetics," and of the work of other scholars, not forgetting the old, but still valuable, commentary of Tyrwhitt. He has been careful, too, in the matter of cross-references—a very important thing for the student of this treatise. The comment on the puzzling contradiction in chapters xiii and xiv (very likely ultimately a textual difficulty) between the two views, that the best tragedies end unhappily, and that the horror of the tragic act is most effective when the act becomes imminent, but is not carried out, is fully recognized by Professor Cooper, and judiciously treated. Less judicious is his statement (p. 35) that the peripety, or reversal, in the "Œdipus Rex," "as we know the play," is not brought about by the messenger, as Aristotle says it is. Bywater's words are more to the point: "It is, as Aristotle says, the natural result of the arrival of the Messenger and his disclosure in the preceding scene." The implication that Aristotle may have known a somewhat differently constructed play is surely unnecessary. In the matter of typography, what advantage is there in printing Greek words and phrases in English italics? To one who knows Greek letters the practice seems a barbarism; and what profit is it to the student of English, when he does not know them, if he is simply enabled to mispronounce a lot of syllables he does not understand? If, however, one does print in this way, the inconsistent use of initial "K" and "C" (pages 9 and 72) needs revision. But these are small matters. The book is excellent and to be cordially recommended.

In our obituary notice of John Swett (Nation, August 28) we stated that he was a graduate of the Merrimack Normal Institute, Reed's Ferry, N. Y. The school, now known as the McGaw Normal Institute, is in Reed's Ferry, N. H.

Wayland Everett Benjamin, attorney and editor of law books, died last week at the age of fifty-four years. He was born in Boston and was graduated from Peddie Institute and in 1877 from Brown University. He obtained his lawyer's degree from the Boston University Law School two years later, and in 1882 was admitted to the bar. He collaborated with the late Austin Abbott in the preparation of "Abbott's Digest" and other works. He edited the Railway and Corporation Law Journal, "New York Annotated Cases," and "Benjamin's Table of Chalmers's Digest of Bills and Notes," and, with the late Justice David McAdam, prepared one of the editions of "McAdam on Landlord and Tenant."

Prof. Arminius Vambéry, one of the best known travellers and Orientalists of the nineteenth century, died in Budapest on Monday in what was said to be his eighty-second year. He was uncertain as to the date of his birth. When asked to sign Queen Victoria's Birthday Book at Windsor in 1889, he confessed his ignorance and, with the royal permission, entered the date of March 19, 1832. "I am quite sure," he wrote in his Memoirs, "that among the many guests at Windsor there was never another to whom the day and year of his entry into this world were unknown." Whenever born, Vambéry was the son of a devout Jew and distinguished Talmudist named Bamberger, whose patronymic suffered in course of time a Magyar change into "Vambéry." The son was by turns a tailor's apprentice, a pupil of Piarist Friars and of Lutheran pastors, and a private tutor of languages. A taste for Oriental literature, acquired during his linguistic studies, and popular legends of the Asiatic origin of the Magyars so drew him towards the East that, in the later fifties, he made his way to Constantinople, where, for a while, he eked out his penury by reciting Turkish and Persian poems in the coffee-houses of Stambul. Having obtained from the Hungarian Academy of Sciences a subsidy of some £80 on condition that he should visit Central Asia to investigate the affinities of the Magyar tongue, he joined a caravan of mendicant pilgrims on its way back from Mecca to Persia. Afterwards he settled as University Professor of Oriental languages at Budapest in what he called "the medium state of culture of my native land." There he made of his home the centre of a campaign against Russian expansion in Central Asia and in favor of an active British policy of resistance. Corresponding in their own languages with Tartars and Turcomans, Osmanlis, Persians, Hindus, and Parsees, he kept himself in constant touch with the East, and supplemented his knowledge by periodical visits to Constantinople, where in later years he became an adviser of Sultan Abdul Hamid. Among Professor Vambéry's published works are: "Wanderings and Adventures in Persia," "Sketches of Central Asia," "History of Bokhara," "Manners in Oriental Countries," "The Turkish People," and "Western Culture in Eastern Lands."

Science

The "Life of Dr. Nathan Smith," one of the founders of the Yale Medical School, will shortly be issued by the Yale University Press.

Welcome geographical information about Spain and Portugal is to be found in a serviceable "Resumen fisiográfico de la Peninsula ibérica," by Juan Dantin Cereceda, professor in the Institute of Guadalajara, published by the "Instituto nacional de ciencias fisico-naturales" as the ninth number of the "Trabajos del Museo de ciencias naturales" (Madrid: Fortanet). It opens with a nine-page bibliography, and then discusses relief, coasts, hydrography, climate, and biogeography. The method of treatment is much more explanatory than that usually found in Spanish geographical essays; yet, in connection with the relief of the peninsula, the description is still largely empirical, and the explanations given are too often geological rather than physiographical, the rock-formations which make up the different districts being more definitely described than the present aspect of their surface. Nevertheless, the text and the numerous diagrams and outline maps present a large amount of pertinent information. If later "Trabajos" take up the districts here described in general terms and present them in greater detail, the geography of the Peninsula will be much advanced.

Since 1907 Sir Ray Lankester has made weekly contributions to the Daily Telegraph, of London. These have been short papers on a great variety of subjects, largely, but by no means exclusively, topics of biology. Sir Ray's purpose has been to inform the reader and to awaken a desire to seek more detailed knowledge elsewhere. The execution of this purpose is most admirable in form. A couple of years ago a selection of these papers was published as a book, and now a second series of thirty-one of them, with some revision and expansion, as "Science from an Easy Chair" (Holt), is at hand. Here the interest is often biological, ranging from kisses and laughter to cookery, the problems of immunity, and the teeth of mammals. There are also entertaining chapters on Switzerland and glaciers, the pygmy races of man, prehistoric petticoats, the gallop of the horse and its relation to the apparent size of the moon, and many other matters. Numerous plates and pictures are added to make an attractive book well suited not only to easy chairs, but even to hammocks not totally abandoned to frivolity.

"Malaria, Cause and Control" (Macmillan), by William B. Herms, of the University of California, is chiefly interesting in the account of the prevalence of the disease in that State and of the methods thus far employed to remove the cause, more particularly in what are called the Penryn crusade and the Oroville campaign. Incidentally much information is given about mosquitoes in general and the means available for their destruction. This is done in simple language, so that the book ought to be useful in many communities where mosquitoes are more or less of a menace. As to the history of the disease and the classification of the insects, Herms leaves much to be desired. There is a very limited bibliography.

"When to Send for the Doctor" (Lippincott), by Frieda E. Lippert and Arthur Holmes, contains most of the conventional information concerning emergencies and the way of meeting them before the doctor comes. It deals more particularly with the care of children and, as the questions are approached from the psychological point of view, it differs from other books of its class in seeking to aid in the recognition of defects and conditions not commonly reckoned as emergencies. Here much more is done than the full title indicates, and the book ought to help many parents to seek good advice early. The language is often rather too feminine in character, as in the frequent use of "tiny," a "tiny vacation" being perhaps the worst instance.

It is a great satisfaction to have so excellent a treatise as "The Principles and Methods of Geometrical Optics" (Macmillan), by Prof. James P. C. Southall, of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, reach a second edition. This book has already attained the place of being the standard text in English on this subject. While it is true that a large portion of the new work in geometrical optics is done by the Germans, yet Professor Southall has produced a text which in many respects is the most comprehensive and lucid in existence. Besides giving us an accurate text, he has accomplished much in the way of establishing a uniform notation for optics by adding a classified catalogue of symbols as an appendix.

The trustees of the American Medicine Gold Medal Award have bestowed on Milton J. Rosenau, of the Harvard Medical School, the gold medal for 1913. Dr. Rosenau was one of the founders of the Milk and Baby Hygiene Association.

Edward Lyman Morris, biologist and curator of Natural Science in the Museum of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences since 1907, died last week at the age of forty-two. He was born at Monson, Mass., October 23, 1870, and was educated at Monson Academy, at Amherst College, and at the Harvard Graduate School. He was laboratory assistant and instructor in botany at Amherst, 1893-95; instructor in botany at Western High School, Washington, 1895-96, and later became head of the department of biology in the Washington High Schools. He was also special plant expert of the United States Herbarium and the United States Department of Agriculture, and field assistant of the United States Fish Commission.

EXPERIMENT IN POPULAR OPERA.

Grand opera at popular prices is not a new thing in New York, but there is much that is new and interesting about the experiment which began at the Century Opera House on Monday. In the first place, it is not a mere money-making scheme, but due to a desire to furnish good, if not the best, opera at reasonable prices to those whose purses do not permit attendance at the Metropolitan performances. The absence of any effort to compete with these has led almost to coöperation between the two undertakings; at any rate, there is the friendliest feeling between them, and Mr. Otto H. Kahn, the leading spirit in the Metropolitan board of directors, is also a director of the Century Company. So far, the public has shown great interest in the venture, and if one may judge by the impressive subscription list, it starts with substantial promise of popular support. Whether it can succeed in the long run is a question that requires the test not only of this winter, but of the next as well.

But this is not the only important question to be answered by the new enterprise. For several years the directors of the Metropolitan have been bombarded with requests for opera in English, a special society having, indeed, been organized to urge that "reform," its main argument being that, just as all operas in Paris are sung in French, in Berlin in German, in Milan in Italian, so should operas in New York be sung in the language of this country. The reply to this argument has been that more is lost than is gained by using translated librettos, and that the operatic managers in Paris, Berlin, and Milan would be only too glad to give each opera in its original language if they could afford to engage so large a galaxy of stars as we have in New York. By this consideration the rulers of the Metropolitan have been guided. In the Century House each opera is first to be given in English, and afterwards in the original, so that the question of language will be fairly tested by comparison.

In selecting for the opening night Verdi's "Aïda," the management showed much wisdom. It is the best and most popular opera of a composer the centenary of whose birth is just now celebrated the world over. It is, moreover, an extremely effective opera. The performance, as a whole, was surprisingly good, and happily disappointed those who came prepared to see a merely amateurish exhibition. It would naturally be unfair to give a definitive opinion either of the prospects for the whole season or of the capabilities of the individual artists, some of whom showed distinct signs of nervousness. But the sum total compelled immediate respect and admiration for the way the great task before the new company had been grappled with. The chorus is full of promise, its costuming was brilliant, the pageantry quite impressive, and the stage-setting all that could be asked. "Aïda" is given less well to-day in many cities abroad which pride themselves upon their opera.

On the whole, the standard of enunciation was high. About three-quarters of the singers engaged for the Century Company are natives of this country, while some of the others are English. Many of the American-born members of the Metropolitan have, on various past occasions, made a sorry showing in using their own language for operatic purposes, but the outcome of the present test of English as a singing language was distinctly encouraging, though it is, no doubt, easier to project words comprehensibly into the auditorium of the Century Theatre than across the gigantic spaces of the Metropolitan. It is regrettable, however, that a better translation of the text than the clumsy version used on this occasion could not have been obtained.

As for the orchestra, it was there one noticed the greatest contrast with the standards of the Metropolitan. It is lacking both in quality and in ensemble, its basses being particularly in need of the attention of the conductor, Mr. Alfred Szendrei, a Hungarian, whose conducting of several Wagnerian operas in Chicago was highly praised. He has undoubted ability and great spirit, and is to be credited with much of the vigor of the performance, and can probably be relied upon to put on the necessary finish and bring about the proper balance among his instrumentalists.

One of the most interesting exhibits in Parma in connection with the Verdi centenary celebration is an operatic orchestra of the time of Monteverdi, all the players (reproduced in wax) being attired in the costumes of their time, holding the peculiar instruments of the seventeenth century.

In Verona the Verdi centenary will be celebrated next month by an open-air performance of "Aïda" in the old Roman Amphitheatre. The utmost possible realism is aimed at; palms and flowers and live animals peculiar to Egypt will be imported. About one thousand persons will take part in the performance, which will be conducted by the famous Milanese leader, Serafin. He intended at first to use the recently discovered overture to "Aïda" (suppressed by Verdi), but seems to have changed his mind.

Having composed for his last opera some waltzes quite in the manner of Johann Strauss, Richard Strauss has now undertaken to write the music for a pantomimic dance arranged by Nijinsky for the Russian dancers who have become so popular in London. "Potiphar's Wife" is the name of the ballet. Strauss, who is a great admirer of these Russians, has already written half of the music; his mind is said to be "overflowing with ideas"—which, if true, is new.

Février's opera, "Monna Vanna," was favorably received at its first performance in Berlin by the audience; the critics, however, interlarded their praise with a number of "ifs" and "buts." That Maeterlinck's play is well adapted to an operatic setting was admitted, but Février's music seemed to lack the note of individuality. The greater part of the score, says the Boersen-Courier, is made up of the familiar "operatic jargon" now generally spoken in Debussyan Paris. There are some effective dramatic moments, but in the lyric portions the opera is disappointing. It is, of course, possible that if the opera had been sung by French artists, it would have made a better impression on the censors. It was not performed at the Royal Opera, but by the Sachse Opera Company.

The most noticeable trait of contemporary English composers is, according to a German critic, their eagerness to imitate every Continental new departure, every change in the fashion of harmonizing or orchestrating.

Mahler's eighth symphony, which requires for its performance a thousand players and singers, is to be heard this season in London as well as in Paris.

The latest Don Juan opera is by the Italian composer Franco Alfani. It has nothing in common with Mozart's masterwork except the hero himself. Tired of the life he has been leading, he seeks refuge in a ruined castle in Corsica. A young woman, suspecting him of being the assassin of one of her relatives, gathers a mob of peasants and enters the castle. She discovers her mistake, promptly falls in love with the professional lady-killer, and the two escape while the peasants are burning what remains of the castle.

Granados, the "Spanish Chopin," some of whose fascinating piano pieces were played in New York last season by Ernst Schelling, is becoming known in Germany, too. Among others, the pianist Risler has put his name on his programmes.

Sergius Kussewitzky, the noted double-hass player, has given up touring as a virtuoso. His present ambition is to make his fame as a conductor, and the inheritance of a fortune has enabled him to gratify his wishes. His concerts in Moscow are now the most important musical events in that city. A Tchaikovsky cycle was one of the features of his last season. He gives young Russian composers opportunities to conduct their own works, and also engages eminent foreigners, including Nikisch.

At the present rate of progress—if it is progress—mere men will soon be crowded out of the musical profession. In Berlin, for instance, during the past season, of the 328 vocal recitals given, women contributed 232 and men only 96. In the departments of the piano and the violin, however, men still hold their own. The total number of concerts given in Berlin during the winter season 1912-1913 was 1,210. In all German cities vocal recitals predominate over instrumental, and everywhere more of the vocal recitals are given by women than by men.

Robert Alfred Gaul, author of the oratorio "Hezekiah," the cantatas "Ruth" and "The Holy City," is dead in London. He was born in Norwich, England, in 1837, and was graduated from Cambridge University in 1863 as Mus. Bach. He was, up to a short time before his death, a teacher and orchestra conductor.

One of the new plays of the London season is an adaptation by G. Constant Lounsbery of the "Dorian Gray" of Oscar Wilde. The London Times says of it:

Whatever else may be said about the literary character of Oscar Wilde, it cannot truthfully be said that he was dull. Yet he was turned last night on the stage of the Vaudeville Theatre into a bore, and an exasperating bore. The explanation is very simple. All the features of Wilde's story, "The Picture of Dorian Gray," for which it is worth reading—his characteristic wit, his intellectual curiosity, his brilliant coruscations of paradox, and a quite valuable little set of sound aphorisms on æsthetic criticism—are features which cannot be transferred to the stage. The features which can be so transferred—the features of violent, melodramatic action—are the worthless part of the book.

The death—at his home near London—is announced of John J. Wood, who, under the pen name of Hickory Wood, wrote the Drury Lane pantomime each year from 1900 to 1910. Mr. Wood, who was fifty-five years old, was the son of Scottish parents, and was born in Manchester. His output as a writer of pantomimes was very large for a number of years. He supplied many of the leading provincial theatres with librettos for their Boxing-night entertainments; he had also written for Australian theatres, and five of his Drury Lane pantomimes were produced in America. In the majority of cases his work for Drury Lane was done in collaboration with Arthur Collins, but twice he was joined by Sir F. C. Burnand. "Mother Goose" was regarded as perhaps the most successful of a Drury Lane series which in point of numbers is thought to have ranked second only to that associated with the name of E. L. Blanchard.

Art

Japan and Its Art. By Marcus B. Huish. Third edition, revised and enlarged. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $5 net.

Mr. Huish's experience with Japanese art is measured by decades, and has been of the most intimate character. As early as 1889, when he first published this work, his position as connoisseur and as editor of the Art Journal had been well established; he has now revised and enlarged his volume for its third edition in the light of his still riper knowledge. The main object of the work was, as it still is, twofold: namely, to recommend the merit of Japanese art to the still largely indifferent Occidental public, and to offer to the collector and the museum such practical hints gathered from the author's own experience as shall enable them to make an intelligent selection from among Japanese works of art which are to be found in the markets of London and New York. Mr. Huish has never for a moment forgotten this double purpose in writing and revising these chapters; and the result is that, among the many volumes on the general art of Japan that have been printed since the opening of the country, his work has maintained a unique place.

The only other work comparable with the present volume for its happy combination of comprehensiveness and brevity is Otto Kümmel's "Das Kunstgewerbe in Japan" (Berlin, 1911). Though both are concerned with what may properly be termed minor forms of Japanese art, the contrast of their points of view is noteworthy, and is indicative of certain limits within which the English work would seem to excel the German, but beyond which Huish's interest falls short of Kümmel's. Mr. Huish is hardly as strong on the more classic forms of the arts of Japan and on the influences that made for their evolution, as on her recent artistic activity, say, after 1600; Herr Kümmel's treatment, on the other hand, is largely historical. A plea that Huish had too practical a purpose in writing his book to delve into the evolution of art would scarcely be tenable, for the volume betrays not a few proofs that his own personal interest has not been deeply cultivated along historical lines.

This work has, therefore, to do almost exclusively with the ukiyo painting and color-prints, and such secondary arts as lacquer, metal-work, enamels, and textiles and embroidery, and includes an excellent chapter on pottery and porcelain from the pen of Mr. Charles Holme. The student of Japan's art history is aware that there are certain well-marked characteristics of these arts in the peaceful Edo period—the diminutive proportions of most of the products; their general spirit of cleverness and cheerfulness, the former sometimes verging on weakness and the latter on the ludicrous; their remarkable variety in design and form; the painstaking care of their authors for detail, ever with an eye for the decorative effect of the whole; and, more important than all else, their constant effort, in painting, in design, and in the use of wood, metal, or earth, to draw fresh art-motives from Nature, and, if possible, to improve on her work, not by supplanting it with human devices, but by assisting it a step further in its own direction. Instead of inquiring how these characteristics came to be developed by Tokugawa artists and artisans, Mr. Huish simply describes them in plain language, and shows, in the maturity of his thought and experience, how the collector, be he an individual or a museum, may profit by a due appreciation of these qualities. The author's suggestions are, therefore, always direct and practical, and, as is instanced by his advice regarding the culture of ornamental plants and the collection of the inro and sword-furniture, very considerate.

No one commenting on this work will forget to refer to the extraordinarily numerous and on the whole well-chosen illustrations it contains. There are six colored plates and 226 cuts in a volume of 360 pages; almost every one of them reproduces an art object, few represent inferior workmanship, and all are handled by the author with remarkable skill for the elucidation of his text.

Finance

UNION PACIFIC AND ITS INVESTMENTS.

For some years—since 1906—Union Pacific stockholders have received 10 per cent. dividends per annum. Of this amount 6 per cent. has come from "railroad operations" and 4 per cent. from "investments." The company's career as an "investor" began in 1901 with the famous purchase of Northern Pacific stock which brought about the "Northern Pacific panic." Prior to that purchase the Union Pacific Company had bought into Southern Pacific in order to procure the Central Pacific connection, acquiring the Huntington estate holdings, some 750,000 shares, for about $40,000,000. Except for this interest, Union Pacific had no large investments outside of its own subsidiary companies.

The dispute arising over the Northern Pacific purchase was settled by the formation of the Northern Securities Company, and Union Pacific found itself in possession of a huge ownership in that company. Then came the liquidation as a result of the Government suit, and in place of Northern Securities stock the Union Pacific Company received Great Northern stock and Northern Pacific stock. These holdings were gradually sold in the open market, and with the proceeds was purchased the collection of securities from which the 4 per cent. dividends above referred to have since been received. This collection comprised stocks of Illinois Central, Chicago & Alton, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, and New York Central, to mention only the principal items, and the prices at which they were purchased were very high, being, in fact, about the high-water mark of a "boom time." The original interest in Southern Pacific was increased by purchases at various times and prices, so as to make the total holding well above one and a quarter million shares.

From this it is clear that Union Pacific is to-day in the position of a large "investor," mainly as a result of an accident, and not by reason of a deliberate plan. If Mr. Hill and Mr. Morgan had not decided to buy the Burlington railway, Mr. Harriman would not have felt it to be necessary for him to buy the Northern Pacific. If the Government had not proceeded to disrupt the Northern Securities Company, it is doubtful whether Mr. Harriman would have thought it necessary to sell the Union Pacific holdings of that stock. What motives finally impelled the Union Pacific Company to buy the particular stocks it did at the time it did are not evident. The shrinkage in these stocks has probably offset the large profit the company made on its Northern Pacific operation. But now, by an accident—Government intervention again—the company is forced to divest itself of its Southern Pacific holdings, and accordingly it has "traded off" some $40,000,000 of this stock for an equal quantity of Baltimore & Ohio, and has sold $88,000,000 for cash. On this particular holding it has made a handsome profit on original cost. Moreover, it has placed its treasury in a position where it has an immense amount of cash on hand. Precisely how much this amounts to is not stated, but probably its loans receivable and cash together amount to well above one hundred millions of dollars. Southern Pacific is known to be largely in Union Pacific's debt.

That some new disposition of the company's investments—probably in the form of some distribution to stockholders—is in question is natural enough. Ten or fifteen years ago a railway company could do what Union Pacific did without attracting very much attention, but nowadays railways as investment companies seem somewhat out of date, and Union Pacific's position is sufficiently unique in this respect to make it a shining mark. Two questions arise in connection with the proposed or suggested distribution, however—one concerning the general propriety of the operation, and the other concerning the preferred stock. Neither question would arise should it merely be a matter of an extra cash dividend to the common stockholders, for the company has a large surplus to profit and loss account against which to charge such dividend, and the cash in hand with which to pay it.

But, supposing a distribution of investment assets in some form to be contemplated, the objection is made by certain people that these assets were acquired by means of capital issues in some form, and that they should be used to retire capital and not distributed. And others insist that the preferred stock must share in any assets distribution whenever it be made. With regard to the first point, it is not easy to earmark capital as having been issued for investment acquisitions, except in the case of common stock. For the original Northern Pacific purchase in 1901 there were used $60,000,000 of convertible bonds, all of which have long been converted into stock, as was the case with the $40,000,000 convertibles used in the same year to buy Southern Pacific stock. Consequently, $100,000,000 of the present common stock represents money invested in the company's treasury assets and in the Southern Pacific stock now sold. Beyond this it is quite impossible to say that any particular form of Union Pacific security represents these assets, because it was issued for their purchase. On the face of it, therefore, their distribution to common stockholders is apparently not inappropriate, assuming, of course, that the Union Pacific Company cannot find a better use for them. As far as the preferred stockholders' claims are concerned, it is hard to see where they "come in" as long as there is "profit and loss surplus" on the books against which a "dividend" can be charged to be distributed on the common stock. If the common stock can receive 6 per cent. more than the preferred, it can apparently receive 60 per cent more—if the "profit" stands on the books. These, however, are matters for the lawyers to settle.

The interesting thing in the whole affair is perhaps the rôle played by accident in determining such vast issues as those here concerned. Never before has a railway company been driven so far afield from its natural path, and it is safe to say that it is not likely to happen again.

Joyous Gard was the Castle of Sir Lancelot in the Morte d'Arthur, into which he retired, in the intervals of war and business, for rest and mirth. Illustrated. 8vo. Half cloth, with board sides. $3.50 net

This volume is uniform with the first series published in 1912, and in it the author continues his studies of the evolution of the English theatre. He endeavors to throw additional light on the obscurity of the Elizabethan stage and to emphasize the remarkable vitality of its conventions by demonstrating how many of them contrive to wind their tendrils around the trunk of early picture-stage dramaturgy. The edition is limited to 760 copies printed from type.

The Lost Language of Symbolism

An Inquiry into the Origin of Certain Letters, Words, Names, Fairy Tales, Folk Lore and Mythologies.

By HAROLD BAYLEY

Profusely illustrated in the text. 2 volumes. 8vo. Cloth, $6.00 net per set Almost every phase of the subject is treated and the author shows what an enormous effect symbolism has exercised on language, and to what far-reaching extent words are "fossil-poetry." It contains upwards of 1,400 fac-similes of mediæval emblems and an unparalleled array of facts relative to ancient and modern symbolisms of East and West.

Pierre de Coulevain, who died recently in Lausanne, had the distinction of writing books more widely read than those of any other living Frenchwoman.

She began to write for publication at the age of fifty-seven, and the secret of her success lay in a broad knowledge of life, a strong sympathy with all that is best in human nature, and in a natural charm of expression, which put her in touch at once with sensitive, thinking women universally.

"On the Branch" ran through 179 editions in France, "The Heart of Life" through 133, and so forth; in addition to the translations by Alys Hallard, which are popular in both England and America.

As an artist in satire "Max" is here "at the top of his form," concisely expressing the shrewd wit which spares no personality, however great. Since the Spring exhibition some of these drawings are famous on both sides of the sea. e.g., that of the German Crown Prince over the legend, "Dawn of a horrid doubt as to the Divine Right." Harding's New Medieval and Modern History

By SAMUEL BANNISTER HARDING, Ph.D., Professor of European History, Indiana University.

This book lays emphasis on social, industrial, and cultural topics, and enables the student to understand modern conditions and tendencies. The narrative is brought fully up to date, including such recent events as the British Parliament Act of 1911, the Italian-Turkish War, and the Balkan War, 1912-1913. Each topic is made definite and concrete, and such important subjects as the Unification of Italy and the Unification of Germany are treated in separate chapters. The teaching apparatus has been made as useful as possible by the arrangement and the typography of the text, and by the addition of chronological tables, lists of important dates, suggestive topics and questions for the pupil to investigate, and brief directions for general reading. Adequate illustrations and maps are inserted profusely throughout the text.

Economic Prizes

TENTH YEAR

In order to arouse an interest in the study of topics relating to commerce and industry, and to stimulate those who have a college training to consider the problems of a business career, a committee composed of

Professor J. Laurence Laughlin, University of Chicago, chairman,
Professor J. B. Clark, Columbia University,
Professor Henry C. Adams, University of Michigan,
Horace White, Esq., New York City, and Professor Edwin F. Gay, Harvard University, has been enabled, through the generosity of Messrs. Hart, Schaffner & Marx, of Chicage, to offer in 1914 four prizes for the best studies in the economic field.

In addition to the subjects printed below, a list of available subjects proposed in past years will be sent on request. Attention is expressly called to the rule that a competitor is not confined to topics proposed in the announcements of this committee, but any other subject chosen must first be approved by it.

1. The competitive relations of the Suez and Panama Canals.
2. A study of the economic conditions preceding and following the crisis of 1907.
3. Price regulation by governmental authority.
4. A theory of public expenditures.
5. A study of shipping combinations in ocean transportation and their influence on rates.
6. How far has the regulation of freight charges affected the development of railways in the United States?
7. A study on the changes of modern standards of living.
8. A study of the cost to the United States of its possession of the Philippine Islands.

Class B includes only those who, at the time the papers are sent in, are undergraduates of any American college. Class A includes any other Americans without restriction; the possession of a degree is not required of any contestant in this class, nor is any age limit set.

A First Prize of One Thousand Dollars, and A Second Prize of Five Hundred Dollars are offered to contestants in Class A.

A First Prize of Three Hundred Dollars, and A Second Prize of Two Hundred Dollars are offered to contestants in Class B. The committee reserves to itself the right to award the two prizes of $1,000 and $500 of Class A to undergraduates in Class B, if the merits of the papers demand it. The committee also reserves the privilege of dividing the prizes offered, if justice can be best obtained thereby. The winner of a prize shall not receive the amount designated until he has prepared his manuscript for the printer to the satisfaction of the committee.

The ownership of the copyright of successful studies will vest in the donors, and it is expected that, without precluding the use of these papers as theses for higher degrees, they will cause them to be issued in some permanent form.

Competitors are advised that the studies should be thorough, expressed in good English, and although not limited as to length, they should not be needlessly expanded. They should be inscribed with an assumed name, the class in which they are presented, and accompanied by a sealed envelope giving the real name and address of the competitor. No paper is eligible which shall have been printed or published in a form to disclose the identity of the author before the award shall have been made. If the competitor is in CLASS B, the sealed envelope should contain the name of the institution in which he is studying. The papers should be sent on or before June 1, 1914, to "Farmers from New England, business-men and clerks from the Middle States, planters and younger sons from the South; on foot and on horseback, carrying their possessions, large or scanty, in vehicles drawn by horses, mules, oxen, and cows, they struggled westward. They endured enormous toils; perpetually in fear of attacks by Indians, meeting the dangers, delays, and perplexities, of wild men, strange surroundings, rough traveling, swollen streams, and exhausted live stock."

The span of Admiral Dewey's experience comprehends almost the entire history of our navy, as this paragraph from his preface indicates:

"My memory stretches from an apprenticeship under the veterans of the War of 1812, those heroes of the old sailing frigates and ships of the line; from the earlier days of the steam-frigates through the Civil War; from the period of inertia in the 'seventies,' when our obsolete ships were the byword of the navies of the world, to the building of the ships of our new navy which I was to give its first baptism of fire; and, finally, to my service as head of the general board of the navy since the Spanish War."

Early Memories

A Volume of Biography and Reminiscence

Senator Lodge

Recalls a Boyish View of Sumner Just Before the War

His father raised him to a terrace coping before the State House.

"Presently an open carriage drove up with some gentlemen seated in it and stopped near the spot where I was placed. Then a tall man, who I knew was Mr. Sumner, stood up in the carriage, and at the sight of him a shout rose from that crowd the like of which I have never heard since, and I have heard, in the course of my life, many crowds, and some mobs, cheer and yell. Then memory drops the curtain and I remember no more."

This is an example of the innumerable significant scenes upon which the distinguished author throws the searchlight of his memory. Few men of the day have had a life so full of rich experience as that which he here recounts up to his early days in Congress.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1913.

The Week

Every American with any feeling of pride in the intelligence of our National Legislature must rejoice at the decision of the conference committees on the Tariff bill of the two houses to strike out the Senate's restrictions upon the importation of art objects. As a result engravings and etchings go back on the free list, and the duty on paintings in oils, pastels, on pen-and-ink drawings and on sculpture, is reduced to 15 per cent. If one hundred years old, such articles will come in free of duty. The 15 per cent. duty on modern works is bad enough, for there should be no tariff on art objects whatsoever, but it is far better than the 25 per cent. of the Senate. Again, the Senate's condition that a private collector must pay duty on any works of art of antiquity, unless within five years after importation they are turned over to a museum or to a public institution, was done away with. Indeed, the advocates of free art were successful on every important point, and the particular thanks of all art lovers the country over should go to Chairman Underwood for his brave and enlightened stand upon this matter. The real animus of the Senate was a desire to strike at Wall Street millionaires with art tastes; for this reason they were willing to retard the art development of the entire country.

A familiar, but interesting, fallacy crops up in a letter on the banana tax which our Senate tried to put into the Tariff bill, sent all the way from Alexandria, Egypt, to the editor of the London Economist. The writer says:

> The cost to the consumer would be 5c. per 100 (approximate) bananas, which is equal to 1-20th of a cent each.
> It is, I believe, generally found that a new tax placed on articles retailed to the people as are bananas cannot in practice be obtained from the consumers unless it approximates a current coin per item; and therefore it seems to me this tax would not be felt by the actual consumers.

There is no reason to believe that, in any proper sense, any such thing is "generally found." It is true enough that a twentieth of a cent cannot be added to the price of a banana; and even that, in practice, one cent cannot be added to the price of a dozen bananas. But the addition of twelve-twentieths of a cent to the wholesale cost of a dozen bananas may be just the straw that decides the raising of the retail price by five cents.

From the moment of the actual assembling of the court of impeachment at Albany, a new character was stamped on the whole situation. Not only did it become at once evident that the outward behavior of the Senators would, throughout the proceedings, be such as befits a transaction of serious and solemn character and having behind it centuries of impressive tradition, but it became plain that in matters of law the judgment of those who are authorities on the law—and especially, of course, of the able and upright judge who presides over the trial—would have that controlling influence to which it is entitled. That in the final vote, or even in every critical division, this spirit will be manifested without wavering, it would be premature to say; but no one can doubt that the Senate as a body has been raised far above that plane upon which most of its individual members usually live and move and have their being.

Nor is it only within the court that there has been such a change of temper. The whole reading public—most certainly all the intelligent part of the public—is thinking about the affair in a more responsible and more rational manner. There is still, to be sure, and there will probably remain to the end, a great deal of that attitude—natural enough, perhaps, but loose-jointed and dangerous—which regards the question at issue to be a question of the relative wickedness of Murphy and Sulzer, or of the relative importance of Tammany graft and of Sulzer misdoing. But that sort of thing is now retreating steadily into the background. The feeling that the business in hand at Albany is the settlement of certain specific and definite questions cannot fail to become more and more impressed upon everybody who has any capacity at all for straight thinking. The mere spectacle of the unanimity of the vote on the exclusion or inclusion of the four challenged Senators must of itself have gone far towards sharpening the public vision, towards centring the public attention upon the real thing. As the trial proceeds, it is not too much to expect the feeling to become general that the place to settle with Murphy is at the polls, and that the only legitimate question at Albany is that of the law and the facts relating to the articles of impeachment.

To be independent of one's environment is not always easy, but it was apparently no trouble at all for the two candidates for the Democratic nomination for Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts, who had a "debate" in Faneuil Hall the other evening. The inspiring associations of that auditorium bothered them not a whit. "He never worked for any Democrat in his life but himself," thundered Mr. Long. "He is unfriendly to union labor," retorted Mr. Barry. "He cannot speak on the issues—tariff, currency, banks, railroads," argued the first debater. "He is a millionaire," replied the second. "He couldn't get a vote outside his own bailiwick," reasoned Mr. Long. "His friends are professional lobbyists," rejoined Mr. Barry. Now and then the issues were even more closely joined between them, as when one of them accused the other of having described himself as a member of the Congregational Church and a Mason, and his opponent replied that he was injecting religion into politics. In the end, however, they found a point of agreement, each gentleman winding up his address with the declaration: "I shall be the Democratic choice by a convincing majority." It is said that the figure of Daniel Webster in the large canvas, depicting him when making the reply to Hayne, became tinged with green long before this forensic struggle was over.

Even those who have noted the growth of interest in Australian and Argentine imports of meat into the United States may find surprise in the report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce that 3,000,000 pounds were imported in the months of June, July, and August. These figures almost equal the total imports for the entire fiscal year preceding, and are doubly significant as representing the experimental attitude of foreign shippers. In view of them, and the approaching passage of the Underwood Tariff bill, the prediction of the president of the American Meat Packers' Association that we shall yet pay $1 a pound for beef seems somewhat inopportune. The Canadian papers are already complaining of a local advance in prices, from the expected movement of Northern meats to cheapen the inviting American market. Nor does much of the discontent among stock-growers with the alleged unsatisfactory state of affairs agree with the packers in tracing it to a national decline in meat growing. In the Southwest the big ranch system is still held to be at the root of the shortage, and there is a renewed demand for the division of the ranges. The summer's drought has also had its effects. Immovable pessimism seems to be confined to the ranks of the big packers.

Effective as Secretary Daniels's continued protests may be in obtaining cheaper armor-plate bids, they have yet shown but a slight basis of reason for his pet scheme of a Government plant. It may be quite easy to show that the American bids are exorbitant, and even that they smell of collusion among the competitors. It may be demonstrable that the steel companies' prices show little relation to the known cost of production. Other countries—notably England, only a few months ago—have given complaining voice to the same conditions. But all this does not prove that the plan of Government manufacture of armor is justified on the ground either of economy, of national policy, or of national sentiment towards militarism. Possibly there are hidden reasons why the steel firms are not eager competitors. The American market is small, and the completion of the Brazilian dreadnoughts leaves a limited field in foreign shipbuilding here. But the wastefulness of our Government in business is too glaring to justify further ventures, and particularly one into the realm of expert steel manufacturing. With the new spirit concerning protection which the passing of the tariff bill may be supposed to inaugurate, it will perhaps not be impossible for patriotism to rise to the point of admitting foreign manufacturers to estimate upon the contracts.

The election of President Hadley, of Yale University, to the board of directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, is the most encouraging event in years in the management of our railways. Here is a man who is not only the head of a great New England university, with a special interest in the New Haven Railroad by reason of its location, but one who at an early age made himself an authority on railway transportation. Railway men as well as theoretical students of our transportations have alike conceded his high standing, and the United States Government recognized it when Mr. Taft made President Hadley the chairman of the important and useful Railroad Securities Commission. To the New Haven board has been added a skilful and practical business man such as the head of almost every great university now is. But more than that, his mere presence in the directorate gives positive assurance to the public that there is already an end to many of the evils which have brought the New Haven Railroad to such bad times. For no one can associate Mr. Hadley with the Mellen methods of doing business.

In the early days of child-labor legislation, much opposition came from both employers and operatives, and improvement depended largely upon disinterested reformers. It is not often recognized that this condition has not ceased to exist. Yet opposition on the part of workmen to Massachusetts's new child-labor law is so violent that a Legislative committee is investigating the matter. At a hearing by this body at New Bedford, 500 mill workers voted in opposition to the bill, with six in its favor. Their chief argument was on the once familiar ground of its painful reduction of the family income. Providing that no child under fourteen should be employed at all, and none under sixteen more than eight hours, it was alleged that it threw large families into utter poverty. Employers testified that no fifteen-year-old lad was injured by mill work, and teachers that the older children thrown out of work refused to enter school. These Massachusetts workers hold that the bill should be supplemented by State relief to widows and others upon whom it works a hardship, as well as by plans for making their leisure useful to the children. Many, moreover, urge a more stringent medical examination as a substitute for the high age-limit—a point that should interest States contemplating a similar law.

"A tip is nothing else but a reward for special consideration. The question will never be solved as long as any man who asks for special service is in the habit of giving a reward for it."—One hotel manager.

An eminently sane proposition. See, for instance, what special service and special consideration the citizen of New York or Chicago obtains by tipping the waiter. When the customer sits down, the waiter refrains from whisking the chair out from under the customer and letting him fall to the floor, as the waiter might very easily do. When he brings in the soup, he brings it in a plate instead of a bottle. Who would grudge a small tip for being spared the humiliation of pouring soup out of a bottle? And in so many other ways, which the reader can enumerate for himself, the waiter puts himself out to make the diner comfortable. He refrains from sprinkling sugar over the roast beef and putting olive oil into the ice cream. Between courses he does not sit down to his own meal. If the diner happens to be in the company of a lady, the waiter will abstain from disparaging remarks about her complexion. As for the coat-room boy, what is to prevent him from playing football with your hat, except the special consideration due a distributer of tips?

What Reinhardt, who was an interested spectator, has done for Shakespeare, Hauptmann has accomplished for Schiller. He has infused "Tell" with the spirit of his own naturalistic plays, like "The Weavers," and removed every element not true to life.

Thus Dr. Rudolf Tombo, of Columbia University, commenting for the New York Times on a recent production of "William Tell" in a version apparently revised by Gerhart Hauptmann. What Reinhardt, of Sumurun fame, has done for Shakespeare! What Mr. Belasco, we hope, will some day do for "Œdipus Rex"—take out a lot of the guff and bluster and insert the punch that Sophocles did not always have with him. What the creator of the "Nude Descending a Staircase" will do some day, let us hope, for Raphael and Rembrandt. What Mr. Irving Berlin will do some day for Beethoven. What Sheriff Harburger may do some day for Demosthenes and Daniel Webster—the punch, the wallop, the ginger, the tabasco, the real stuff. Let us modernize, my masters; let us naturalize, let us barbarize!

The "loved of Heaven, whose path is the ancient green," have lost again, and the oleaster is fastened to the blade of an American cleek. Miracles are plainly not to cease, for here is a mere American boy, just out of his teens, beating the world's great masters at their own game. What is there left to John Bull? No wonder he talks now of withdrawing from the Olympic Games because of the professional character of their amateurishness. There remains, it seems, but rowing and cricket in which he can claim absolute unbroken supremacy, and who shall say now that a Harvard or Cornell crew may not soon cross the water and lead an English boat over the 'varsity course?

One has only to read the story of Ouimet's play to know that he is gifted with extraordinary nerve and courage. Where a single miss of an extremely difficult shot or putt would have cost him his chance of entering the final test as his country's representative, he invariably came to time with the skill of the master. Neither the great gallery nor the excitement nor the responsibility had any other effect than to better his play. So he who was defeated by the champion Travers in the amateur championship attained what no other American has ever accomplished—the winning of the championship open to both amateurs and professionals. Three times English amateurs have humbled their professionals, but never before did an American walk off with the trick, with the best of the Englishmen to beat in the bargain.

However just and however shocking may be the charges of Commissioner Worcester that slavery, or at least a gross form of peonage, exists in the Philippines, it is quite clear that he cannot lay conditions solely at the door of the native Assembly. Under the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress has power to enforce the regulation against slavery in any place subject to American jurisdiction. Moreover, as Representative Jones points out, since 1902 it has needed no more than Executive initiative to force observance of a clause in the organic law of the Philippines dealing with slavery. Up to 1907 the Commissioners could have dealt directly with the practice; and even since then it has been possible for them to attack it among those tribes where it most flourishes. The truth seems to be that, in so far as Mr. Worcester's statements are especially prejudicial to the Filipino character and ability, they bear the obvious coloring of a desire for the indefinite continuance of American rule. He is, however, to be thanked if between himself and his opponents he can procure measures for the eradication of a disgraceful state of affairs.

If it be admitted that the Asquith Cabinet is beginning to have its qualms about Home Rule at a time when politically the horizon is clear, when Parliament is adjourned, and no immediate crisis can threaten the Liberal Government, the reason may be found in the present state of labor unrest in the United Kingdom. Savage rioting has been going on in Dublin, and though the enactment of Home Rule is still some time off, it is not impossible that the discontented labor element in the Irish capital will try to take advantage of any situation that might necessitate the dispatch of troops to the north of Ireland for the enforcement of Home Rule. Sir Edward Carson and his followers in Ulster, in their turn, will undoubtedly take advantage of the diversion at Dublin to assume a more militant attitude than ever. In England the labor unions have been mobilizing again; and though for the moment the prospect of another general railway strike has been averted, no one can say how soon the danger may reappear. It is not difficult to see why the possibility of simultaneous complications in Ulster, in Dublin, and at home should impress the more timid spirits in the Liberal ranks.

Lovers of justice will be pained by the statement of a former head of the Paris detectives that scientific burglary has no existence outside of the imagination. For a while, it is true, the shoe was on the other foot, and a quality of ingenuity and skill, not to say courtesy, was attributed to the twentieth-century bandit that elevated him into a class by himself. This was doubtless a mistaken estimate, but to say that burglars are altogether lacking in cleverness seems an error in the opposite direction. Will any one assert that it is possible to pursue this calling without some spark of the spirit of adventure, some study of the complicated methods which we have adopted for the protection of our material possessions? Let the doubter think of himself as forced to follow this profession for even a twelvemonth. He will be stout-hearted indeed if his courage does not recoil upon itself, and rarely endowed intellectually if he does not long for expert instruction before undertaking the simplest venture in this field. The Paris detective should reflect that if burglars are the stupid beings he is reported as representing them, the members of his profession cannot be quite the wonderful persons we have often been assured they are.

Not much is left of the treaty of London, in behalf of which the united diplomats of Europe labored so valiantly. By the terms of the Turco-Bulgarian treaty now in the course of negotiation, Turkey retains Adrianople and Kirk-Kilisseh, and shifts the entire frontier from the Midia-Enos line, agreed upon in London, to pretty nearly the old frontier on the north and the Maritza River on the west. Bulgaria's gains resolve themselves into a small triangular area on the Black Sea, and a solid area of approximately five thousand square miles in Western Thrace. Thus is ended the great dream which rose after Lule-Burgas, when the Turks were fleeing for the shelter of the Tchatalja forts. All the battlefields, Adrianople, Lule-Burgas, Kirk-Kilisseh, go to the vanquished. The ease with which Bulgaria has yielded to Turkish demands is not all due to the hopelessness of her military condition. Nor is it all to be explained by the apathy that follows upon the failure of a great hope. In Bulgaria, one imagines, the feeling is general that it is not worth while to be haggling for bits of territory with Turkey; that nothing is of importance now except to prepare and to wait for the day of reckoning with her late Servian and Greek allies.

THE BANKING BILL GOES TO THE SENATE.

The Administration has scored another remarkable success in the vote by which the Banking and Currency bill was passed by the House on Thursday of last week. The vote stood 286 to 84, and in the majority were included thirty-nine Republicans and Progressives. That only three Democrats were ranged on the negative side is perhaps less noteworthy, because of the rigor with which caucus rule has been applied to the case. But most remarkable of all, in view of the previous history of attempted banking and currency legislation, is the expedition with which the result has been attained. To get such a bill advanced to the Senate stage at the end of barely more than six months after his inauguration is an achievement by the President in shining contrast with the paralysis of so many preceding Administrations and so many preceding Congresses. It must be acknowledged, in justice, that the ground had been laid for such an achievement by the work of the National Monetary Commission. This had been done not only through its collection of information and through its proposals and discussions, but also through the concentration of interest and the arousing of immediate expectation. So much of hostile criticism has been levelled at Senator Aldrich that it is only common fairness to give him credit for this great service. But after all such allowance is made, it must still be recognized that there was neither general agreement as to the nature, nor any definite prospect of the actual enactment, of banking and currency legislation, until President Wilson took his determined stand.

There was a stage in the history of this bill when it seemed that the Administration forces might carry their desire for expedition to a dangerous extreme—doubly dangerous as justly exciting powerful opposition, and as making the legislation itself, if enacted, a source of great potentialities of mischief. It soon developed, however, that the Administration and its representatives in Congress were not going to stick with a blind obstinacy to the bill as first drawn. Sober and well-intentioned criticism has received respectful consideration, and some highly important and beneficial changes have been incorporated in the bill. In the original bill the power of the Federal Reserve Board to require one regional reserve bank to discount paper of another was conferred on the Board without limitation; as the bill now stands, it may be exercised only "in time of emergency," only by unanimous vote, with at least five of the seven members present at the meeting; and only on the basis of a higher interest rate than that prevailing in either of the districts affected. The creation of an Advisory Council, representing the regional banks, is another amendment making for safety and conservatism. And as regards currency, the effective provisions now in the bill for insuring prompt redemption of notes by the issuing banks, including the designation of them by a letter or number distinctive for each regional bank, are of the utmost importance.

Nevertheless, after the bill had reached a certain stage, there became pretty manifest a desire to push it through without adequate discussion, and without due regard for objections urged in good faith in the interest of safe banking policy—objections free from hostility to the purpose of the bill or to the avowed spirit of those behind it. We do not say that every one of the proposals we here refer to ought to be accepted; but we do say that they have not received such consideration as they deserve. Among them are a number of changes of comparatively minor importance; but among them, too, are some things which are of very great consequence, and for which the argument is extremely strong. The redemption of the notes in gold and not in "lawful money"; the regulation of the rate of the tax (the so-called "interest") on the notes to be issued; the reduction of the number of regional banks, urged not for the sake of centralization, but for the sake of effectiveness—all these are not fit subjects for the "steam-roller" process. In the Senate, these serious questions—and others, too—should receive that deliberate and searching examination which is warranted by their importance, and by the special nature of the considerations bearing on them.

A curious but not uninstructive episode was that which marked the closing days of the discussion in the House. The flare-up over the question of the gold standard was not warranted by anything that was even remotely in the thoughts of the framers or the friends of the bill. But such a turn was given to the matter that it became an occasion for a show of hands on the part of the silverite Bourbons. And they mustered no less than 69 votes out of a total of 367. They are just now an absurd remnant; yet it is as true to-day as, unfortunately, it has been throughout our history that the seeds of cheap-money manias and fiat-money delusions are always among us, ready to become a source of national danger when the occasion offers. And this lesson was taught even more impressively, for those who stop to think, by a remark of no less a man than the Secretary of State. In his address before the American Institute of Banking at Richmond, Mr. Bryan said:

> It has been objected that the Government should not issue the money of the country. We hear such objection only in times of peace. In times of war there is no question who should issue the money. It must be the Government.

This can mean only one thing. "The money" that Mr. Bryan has here in mind can only be irredeemable paper money. Incredible as it must seem, it is plain that he regards the issue of irredeemable paper money in time of war not only as desirable, but as a thing whose desirability, or necessity, nobody questions. What abysmal depths open up to the mental vision as one contemplates the possibilities of a national Administration—past or future—presided over by a man capable of such an exhibition, in relation to a subject to which he devoted the most strenuous years of his life!

MUST WE ALL BEAR ARMS?

It is quite evident that the Wilson Administration is to differ from the last Democratic Government of the country in more ways than one. Times have changed, and the party with them. So in place of a dignified, courtly Secretary of State like Thomas F. Bayard, we have Mr. Bryan en vaudeville; signs are visible of a disposition to magnify the paternal functions of the Federal Government in relation to the country's business; and we now have a Democratic Secretary of War who virtually tells us that we must all bear arms and learn to fight, or face the penalty of a tremendous standing army. To be exact, his words are: "It is the only solution I can see by which we may escape the necessity of a large standing army, which none of us want, and at the same time keep ourselves prepared for emergencies that may arise." And he adds that "we must build up a trained reserve," and to do so we must make young men feel that "military training in the regular army is good for them," and that in "taking this course in military training they will not be wasting their time, so far as their future career in private life is concerned." Besides Secretary Garrison, Senator Chamberlain, of Oregon, also a Democrat, is out with the declaration that the time has come to arm; and there is promise of a drastic army reorganization bill by the next Congress.

Now what is the basis for Mr. Garrison's assertion that we are bound to choose the lesser evil of upbuilding a great military reserve as the sole means of escaping the greater one of a standing army "which none of us want"? Why, if none of us ninety millions of Americans desire it, is a huge standing army in any way a menacing or possible evil? Whatever change in its policies or institutions this country unitedly opposes has not hitherto been regarded as being within the realm of discussion. But let us assume that it is. What changes have come over us since the last Democratic Administration to make either a reserve or a huge standing army necessary? Mr. Cleveland nearly precipitated us into a most serious international complication in the Venezuela matter. Yet we cannot recall that Mr. Lamont ever expressed such sentiments as Mr. Garrison's, or felt that even a large reserve was desirable. Since then we have built up a huge navy, besides strengthening our coast defences vastly beyond the plans of the Endicott Board, appointed during Mr. Cleveland's first Administration. This Board guaranteed that if its projects were carried out, no large fleet would be necessary. Now we have far more coast artillery than was dreamed of by the Endicott Board, as well as a tremendously costly and remarkably efficient navy, and still the cry is that we must individually arm or face a large standing army—that is, shoulder the very burden our immunity from which is the envy of European nations.

We are aware, of course, that we shall be reminded of the Spanish War and of our having become a world Power in 1898. We have forgotten that needless blood-letting not at all, and we are convinced that a study of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration would prove to any sane observer that we were a potent world Power in 1885, with but 22,000 soldiers and a single steel dispatch boat for a navy. Nobody insulted us, nobody stole our territory or captured the San Francisco Sub-Treasury. Moreover, we rejoice to-day in an Administration whose whole tone is so pacific, as demonstrated in the Mexican and Japanese entanglements, as to make Mr. Garrison's militaristic speeches and interviews seem as incongruous as Mr. Bryan's vaudeville career is discreditable to a Secretary of State. So far as the great nations of Europe are concerned, not a single one is on other than the friendliest terms with us, and only a few hopeless war-maniacs like Congressman Hobson still pretend to fear the Japanese fleet. Neither from Mexico nor from Japan is there the slightest reason for concern unless we ourselves go out and cause it. If trouble should come with Mexico, no ordinary amount of reserves will help; from a quarter to half a million of soldiers will be required.

As for the reserve itself, Mr. Root, Mr. Taft, and Mr. Stimson have all pursued that chimera. During the last Congress it was triumphantly announced that the reserve was to be had by means of a seven-year enlistment, of which three years were to be spent with the regiments and four in a reserve from which the soldier would be called in war time or report for small pay in time of peace. The only result was such a falling off in enlistments that the plan is already to be abandoned, and now Mr. Garrison, who is fairly overflowing with military ideas six months after leaving his law practice, would have the enlistment period a fluctuating one, the soldier to be released as soon as he obtains a certain proficiency, whether it be a year or a year and a half, or two. Well, we see no objection to experimenting further along that line, if it does not lead to a legislative attempt to make a nation of reservists. If Mr. Garrison can make the service more attractive to a better class of men, he will have everybody's support. He assures us that the army was never in better shape than to-day. But has he not overlooked his predecessor's last annual report, in which Mr. Stimson wrote that "the high percentage of venereal disease continues to be the reproach of the American army, and the daily average number of those sick from that cause during the past calendar year was larger than the daily average number of those sick from all other of the more important diseases combined"; and that the "record of our army in this respect is shameful beyond that of any other civilized nation"? Is that so very inviting a record as to make any appeal to the "very best young men in the country" whom Mr. Garrison wishes to get into the army?

It is along such constructive lines as bettering this sad state of affairs and putting a stop to the frightful waste of money which goes on daily in the army that Mr. Garrison should employ his unusual abilities. He has taken politics out of the service, appointed generals on merit only, and rebuffed Senators and Congressmen with a fearlessness that deserves high praise. But this is merely the beginning of things. There is still so great an opportunity for economizing, and yet increasing the efficiency of the service, that he might well devote himself to this and let the country be at rest from his talk of the standing army, in the effort to bring about a reserve by luring into the army the "very best young men" of the nation.

WHAT ONE MAYOR HAS DONE.

Among the numerous important city elections to be held this autumn in the United States, two—those in Philadelphia and in Cincinnati—are notable as turning upon the struggle of reform Administrations for endorsement and reëlection. In the former city, its size, its importance, the interest of its decade-long fight with corruption, have drawn national attention to Mayor Blankenburg's campaign. Mayor Hunt's contest with the Cox machine in Cincinnati has been less commented on. But both are signalized by the circumstance that the chief campaign document for the party to which all good citizens pin their hopes is its record of performance. Municipal struggles to oust a corrupt Administration, battles fought over the errors of a party, or a cleavage of opinion upon city policies, are common enough; battles in which reform can stand behind an impregnable record of definite achievement are regrettably rare.

In both cities, therefore, as in other American municipalities, attention has been called to the potential usefulness of the Mayor's annual report in raising the standards of city government by furnishing a key for the comparison of different Administrations, and stimulating official effort and public interest. It is proper to say that in Philadelphia the annual report has not entered into the campaign. Its place has been taken by an abstract published by the Civic Club, reciting improvements in public health, transportation, the streets, and so on. But the Cincinnati report, just issued, is at once an unanswerable argument for progressive government and an impartially official document. Its possible political significance is nothing beside its actual civic value. Its 600 illustrated pages, as a preface tells us, combine the departmental reports "in a more intelligible and interesting form than has heretofore prevailed, condensing statistical data and eliminating perfunctory matter to give a comprehensive history of the year's government." They tell of plans for reducing Cincinnati's death-rate below that of any American city; how the city has procured employment for 2,800 men; how it has protected borrowers against loan sharks; how it has tried to settle industrial disputes; how in one year fire losses were reduced 33 1-3 per cent., twelve theatres, for example, being forced to close, while twenty new and modern ones were built; how moral conditions have improved; how the University of Cincinnati, the only strictly municipal university, we believe, in the country, has grown in its usefulness to 2,000 young citizens.

Pictures, tables, a clear text, impress upon even the casual reader that here is a city vitally interested in its own improvement. Nor are shortcomings glossed over. Side by side with cuts showing dilapidated houses demolished, streets before and after repaving, a playground as in 1910 and in 1912, the water reservoir being cleaned, a new motor fire engine, the newest University building, are cuts of faulty sewers, unsightly tenements, unimproved parks—conditions that cry for improvement. No citizen, irrespective of political beliefs, whether he wishes Mayor Hunt returned to office or not, can examine the book without an elevation of civic pride, a new interest in communal welfare, and an impulse towards alert citizenship that will make him critical of any succeeding Administration that does not live up to the standard therein set.

Municipal reports are usually a dry compte rendu of official routine, tiresomely compiled, and transmitted to council or aldermen, to be but leafed through by those whose duty it is to read them. The only attention they are likely to attract is in narrow discussion of the bookkeeping methods required to give them accuracy. But the wieldiness, the brightness, the attention to the king's English and to good lithography in a volume like that of Cincinnati, testify to a conception of city government that is at every point as wide-awake and energetic as the older one was perfunctory. This new conception is born of such reform Administrations as Philadelphia's and Cincinnati's. It regards the public welfare as an ambition in which public interest is constantly to be stimulated; it catches at opportunity, instead of resting in a placid performance of prescribed duty.

It would be a genuine misfortune if Mayor Hunt should not be reëlected. We have frequently called attention in these columns to the great service rendered to his city by this fearless young man. As Prosecuting Attorney he bravely, if unsuccessfully, attacked Boss Cox, and did his best to land him in jail. In recognition of this and of other excellent work in that office, the electorate rewarded him with the Mayoralty, and for the first time Cincinnati has had a Mayor deeply concerned with beautifying it and improving its conditions of life, with the special view of making it a better city for the masses that live in it. He has been independent of machines; he, too, can say, "I have been Mayor," and Mayor during a period of extraordinary floods and intense industrial disturbances.

CO-OPERATION AT HOME AND ABROAD.

At the Ninth Annual Coöperative Congress, held at Glasgow a few days ago, there were but a handful of American delegates to 340 British, 100 Germans, and more than 100 French and Italians. Our country has been singularly unresponsive to the appeal of the coöperative idea; and it will surprise Americans to find that even the most sanguine of its advocates could use language such as that of Earl Grey in his address to the delegates. It was in their power, he declared, if they were earnest, to realize a coöperative commonwealth co-extensive with the whole civilized world. The remarkable growth of the coöperative movement justified a confident expectation that the day of a new social order was at hand. Coöperation meant the elimination of every unnecessary middleman, who could be conceived in no other light than that of a parasite. The wants of society could never be adequately met so long as the twin forces of labor and capital were warring against each other; and cooperation showed that these warring forces could be reconciled with advantage to all concerned, pointing the way to a social state ruled by fraternalism.

Such high aspirations for what cooperation may accomplish will remind older readers of the opinions and the hopes expressed three-score years ago by economists like John Stuart Mill, rather than of views that have had recent currency or of experiences that are familiar on this side the Atlantic; but though even in Europe what has actually been accomplished can hardly claim to be more than a faint foretaste of what Earl Grey holds forth for the future, yet coöperation in several European countries has attained an extent and importance of which with us there is as yet no indication. The few American communities in which coöperation exists know it only as a dubious experiment in the cutting off of retail profits on food and other commodities. As attempted in suburbs of Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York, it consists in the subscription by a large number of householders of stock in a central depot of supplies, expertly managed, from which they can buy everything at cost. Its most familiar form is in the cooperative store of many college and manufacturing communities of the United States. Here its constituency has a ready-made community of purpose and character; coöperation is easily organized, is not liable to some of the peculiar vicissitudes of large stock companies, and is supported by general sentiment in such tasks as the interdiction of credit buying. But elsewhere coöperation must continue to have a hard path. Americans in general have been thoroughly unsympathetic towards the communal socialism which gave the movement its first impulse. In a prosperous and uncrowded republic, where means of production are vast and competition in retail business intense, the motive for distributive coöperation is less strong than elsewhere; few even of our rural communities have a sufficiently stable population long to preserve its corpus intact; and as for attacking the "parasitic middleman," the average American is careless of the saving thus to be effected. Coöperation's feeble existence in the very country where a century ago Robert Owen made his most ambitious attempt to blend the interests of producer and consumer, and "moralize the processes of industry," is not so inexplicable as might at first sight appear.

But beside the sturdy usefulness of coöperation in other countries, this feebleness must seem regrettable. In the British Isles coöperative societies of a hundred sorts are covering the country like a network, till their overlapping spheres are a frequent cause for quarrels; they buy lands, erect shops, cottages, schools, and lecture halls, write insurance, lend money, grant university scholarships, and even rival Cook in managing holiday excursions. There is no socialistic weakening of individualism in this, for, in the words of a Glasgow speaker, while "idealism is held aloft," they remember that "it is the man who is passing his money over the counter for goods who is advancing the movement." In agriculture, the chief of the fields not yet annexed to capital abroad, and still boasting a workman who is his own master, Ireland in especial offers a brilliant example of how the rewards of labor may be increased by combining for sale and purchase, and for the use of expensive apparatus. Few programmes of agricultural reform in Europe have been lately proposed which do not emphasize Sir Horace Plunkett's coöperative methods. Dispensing with the middleman, threatening the small towns, its federations becoming a vast farmers' union, rural coöperation has been rabidly attacked all over Europe. But even its enemies admit that in the German associations and the French and Russian communes, based on mutual liability and engendering mutual trust, neighborhood ideas of justice, solidarity, and unselfishness develop together with neighborhood prosperity. And in England and Germany both urban and rural coöperation are looked upon as a refuge, not merely from the socialistic philosophy that William James saw giving comfort to a "tenderfoot" laboring class, but from the governmental paternalism which, in Russell's famous phrase, is turning man into "a race of economic babies, their lips forever nuzzling at the nipples of the state."

No doubt, when there is a more exigent need for coöperation in America, it will come. But it must be felt that if it had taken a firmer root when its prospects seemed so bright early in the last century, it might already have proved a wholesome corrective to some of the evils in the labor-and-capital organization of society. What it could have done to reduce the clash between these forces, and to put a soul into soulless industrialism, is evident in the profit-sharing schemes that some advanced corporations are instituting. The development of such coöperative plans is still one of the best grounds of hope for elevating the status of the laboring masses, and a wider interest in them would be a salutary thing for the nation.

FROM THE MEMOIRS OF A SECRETARY OF STATE.

As I look back over my career in the State Department, I am convinced that posterity will remember me chiefly for my invention of the Absent Treatment in diplomacy. Just how this new method differed from other methods, from Pink-Tea Diplomacy, from Blood-and-Iron Diplomacy, from Shirt-Sleeve Diplomacy, and other preceding forms, was best exemplified during the acute Japanese crisis which confronted our Government in the spring of 1914. On the morning of April 1 of that year, the country read with amazement that the Japanese Ambassador was about to call on me with an ultimatum, which meant war in twenty-four hours. The outlook was seemingly hopeless. To yield to the Japanese demands was out of the question. But war was a dreadful thing to contemplate. The country's eyes were upon me. What would the Secretary of State do? The Secretary of State did what he had often done before. On the afternoon of April 1, he was at Phœnixville, Va., lecturing on "Homes and Mothers." The ultimatum was not delivered because when the Japanese Ambassador called there was nobody to receive it. He came again the next morning. I was then at Parkersburg, O., speaking on "Our Debt to the Past." Helpless before my policy of masterly absenteeism, the Japanese Ambassador wired for instructions. Several minor officials at the Japanese Embassy committed hara-kiri. Riots broke out in Tokio. In the course of a week or so matters adjusted themselves.

Very similar were the circumstances surrounding our final settlement of the Mexican imbroglio. We had made certain specific demands upon the Mexican Government, and its Ambassador at Washington was ordered to present a note in which all our conditions were curtly rejected. The Mexican Ambassador was a man of mature years and exceptional intelligence. He did not call at the State Department with his note, but took a taxicab straight for the Union Station. There he found me. Still, being a diplomat of the old school, he thought it necessary to begin the conversation with a few courteous remarks on the weather, the state of my health, etc. At last he came to the subject in hand. "Mr. Secretary of State," he said, "acting under instructions from my Government——" He got no further. Just at that moment I took a train for Luxor, Md., where I was billed for a speech on "The Sanctity of the Cradle." But the incident did not end as simply as all that. The Mexican Ambassador, for all his adherence to old-fashioned courtesy, was a man of infinite resource. He jumped into a touring car and chased the train. Five miles from Luxor and he was racing with us neck and neck. I confess to a thrill of anxiety. Another ten minutes, the train and the auto would be at Luxor, and war with Mexico would be staring us in the face. Just then the Mexican Ambassador blew out one of his front tires. The machine leaped forward, made a half-revolution in the air, and ran into a clay bank. There were no serious injuries, but for ten days the Ambassador was under the care of a surgeon, and by the time he was well again matters had adjusted themselves.

The reader will now see that the principle underlying my Absent-Treatment Diplomacy, like the principle underlying all great discoveries, is a very simple one. The error of most Secretaries of State before me was that they were, without exception, static Secretaries of State. I hit upon the idea of a kinetic Secretary of State. My predecessors were continually implicated in international negotiations and crises, because every foreign diplomat, impelled by a grievance, knew where to find them. Why any one before me should have failed to recognize the simple truth that the easiest way to avoid friction is to avoid contact, puzzles me. When I say "any one," I mean, of course, any man pretending to culture in general and diplomatic training in particular. Otherwise, you will find that I was anticipated in my main idea by the Irishman who, many years before I became Secretary of State, said that the trouble with most people when they are chased by a mad bull is that they run in the same direction as the bull.

RECENT GERMAN POETRY.

Richard Dehmel, whose fiftieth birthday is likely to be the occasion of sympathetic demonstrations, has never surpassed his early volumes which caused him to be acclaimed the most inspired lyric voice of his generation. His new book contains some admirable pages, and some of doubtful value. But it fairly reflects his interesting and powerful personality, and even the note of intensity in the title, "Schöne wilde Welt" (Berlin: S. Fischer), is suggestive of the poet's temperament. His emotional range is wide: he has notes for the feeling of oneness with nature, for the new altruism, for all the longings and strivings of his time; and to the memory of his friend Detlev von Liliencron he has dedicated the most thoughtful tribute among the many poems which his death has called forth. This poem, as also "Gebet im Flugschiff" and "Verewigung," shows a rare spiritual ardor. The "Schöpfungsfeier," with its subtitle, "Oratorium natale," has many beautiful lines, but somehow does not seem to hang well together. "Die Musik des Mont Blanc," divided into movements in the manner of a symphony, would have been more effective without the refrain-like repetition of the "melody," the "harmony," and the "rhythm of the mountain." A daring experiment is the poem called "Dahin," with its series of similes. A young priestess is successively compared to a palm rising from a dream, a cypress swaying in the wind, a sleeping mimosa, a cedar struck by lightning, a storm-tossed vine. But the rhetorical images, far from effacing one another, suggest a dramatic story, and linger in the memory. A charmingly quaint note is struck in the "Ballade vom Kuckuck," which is one of a number of poems having the true feeling of a Volkslied, and among the love lyrics is the original "Zweier Seelen Lied":

Lieber Morgenstern,
lieber Abendstern,
ihr scheint zwei
und seid eins;

Ob der Tag beginnt,
ob die Nacht beginnt, findet euer Schein
in uns Zwein die Liebe wach;

Lieber Abendstern,
lieber Morgenstern,
hilf uns Tag für Tag
eins sein, bis die letzte Nacht uns eint.

As a satirist Dehmel presents himself in an amusing parody upon the factitious Orientalism and verbal artistry of some of his contemporaries, in "Der gestörte Nachtwandler." The cacophonous onomatopœia in the poem called "Stillleben" evokes memories of the grotesque water-sprite in Gerhart Hauptmann's "Sunken Bell," while it visually suggests some of the symmetrical arabesques that greet the eye of the reader In the poetry of another "Jubilar" of the year, Arno Holz. It reads:

Im Frühling wenn's zu nebeln anfängt auf dem Dorfteich—eines Abends: raake:
erster Frosch.
Raake—racka—paake—zweiter.
Und so weiter, bis der ganze Chor
Raake — paake — racker — quacker — Pack macht.
Ueber ihnen
dampft der Sonnenglanz—
Gaukelt still ein Azurfalter drein—herrlich—

Wilhelm Holzamer's posthumous volume, "Gedichte" (Berlin: Egon Fleischel & Co.), is a sad reminder of a gifted life cut short before it had barely fulfilled the promise of its youth. Through his work runs the longing for the lost paradise of his childhood in the sunny vineyards of the Rhine, for the old home and the old folks. "Am Tor der Jugend," "Märchen," "Toter Traum," "Grossmutter," "In meiner Heimat," and "In der Nacht," in the earlier group of his poems, and "Alte Sehnsucht" and "Pfingsten," in the selections from his later years, utter this sentiment with a sincere and beautiful pathos. Even in poems aglow with sunshine, spring-time, and love falls a shadow of sorrow, and the lips that open to sing a pæan of life are sealed by the prescience of death. An admirable specimen is entitled "Nebel":

Ueber die einsamen Wiesen geht leise eine weisse Frau, sie hält die Hände zum Gebet, sie hebt das Haupt zum letzten Blau, das über den schweigenden Himmel weht.

Ueber die Weiden und Pappeln schwebt sich hebend und hebend ihr Gewand, sie breitet die Arme übers Land, darüber ein letzter Laut verebbt.

Und wie ihr Schleier weit und Erde und Himmel und Ferne verhüllt, steigt aus raunender Unendlichkeit das Schweigen, das die Welt erfüllt, in seinen Traum von ewiger Zeit die müde verschmachtende Erde verhüllt.

The centenary of 1813 has produced an abundant crop of curious literary effusions in Germany which are doomed to be ephemeral. One of these is the volume of verse by Ernst Lissauer, "1813" (Jena: Eugen Diederichs). It is a cycle of poems with much of the elemental strength and temperamental fervor that distinguish the author's previous work, but with not a few evidences that the patriotic note, forced to unusual pitch, has inflamed the imagination of the poet, ordinarily so well tempered by good taste, until it runs riot with extravagant metaphors and hyperboles.

Carl Meissner, who is more widely known as author of "Die Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts" and as editor of the works of Novalis than as a writer of poetry, has followed up his first book of verse, published some years ago, with two others, "Der schwere Weg" and "Im Schauen der Dinge" (Eugen Diederichs). The first is the pathetic record of a life reaching out for larger values and doomed to vegetate within the narrow confines of a business career in a provincial atmosphere. The mood changes from grim bitterness to glad acceptance, and is varied by notes of filial love. The other volume is more ambitious, contains poems on a variety of motives—nature, art, love, and life—the keynote is less melancholy, the poet's outlook more hopeful; but the book does not leave the impression of a rare and strong individuality as does "Der schwere Weg."

The reader who has known Hanns Freiherr von Gumppenberg as dramatist, critic, editor, and translator, will gladly turn to his poems, just published under the title "Schauen und Sinnen" (Munich: Georg Müller), for in this book the author is frankly and delightfully personal. It reveals a mind that has outgrown the tempestuous struggles of its time and has attained a wholesome serenity. Gumppenberg does not overcharge his verse with philosophical reflections, yet it holds many a thoughtful and noble message. His imagery is vivid and suggestive, and frequently, as in the following poem, surprises by a subtle meaning:

VERGLIMMENDES SCHEIT.

Wie lohte die Flamme so stark und stolz!
Nun irrt der letzte Funken
Angstvoll durch das verkohlte Holz.

Er läuft und sucht mit jagender Hast,
Ob nirgend mehr Nahrung für ihn sei,
Nirgend mehr Rast—
Hab Acht, hab Acht!
Vor und wieder zurück
Versucht er sein Glück.

Jetzt trifft er mitten im Lauf
Den grausamen harten Ast,
Und springt hochauf
Hinaus in die Nacht—
Knirr knist!
Es ist
Wie ein Schrei . . .
Und alles vorbei.

A book of very uneven value is "Anima Candida" (Vienna: Hugo Heller & Co.), by Wladimir Freiherr von Hartlieb. But the reader who is not discouraged by the trite pessimism and the well-worn stanzas of the "Elegie einer Kindheit," or repelled by the dismal notes of "Der Dämon," will be amply rewarded by the third and last poem, which gives the book its title. For this hymn of the life force and the ego in its free rhythmic movement is a most interesting Credo expressed in an unconventional, yet irreproachable, manner. The spirit of Whitman is in this confession. The youth awakening to consciousness of himself, of his well-built body, his open senses, his searching mind, his yearning soul, ready to give himself and ready to take what others would give him, hears the call of friendship, of love, and perceives the rent in the veil which had hidden from his child eyes nature's supreme secret. He sings a song of himself, of his coming into manhood, and of his oneness with nature. He exultantly sings the joy of life and in reverent awe bows before the mystery of its extinction. There is a powerful suggestion in his meditations on death:

Du bist das Wunderwirkende, o Tod, du nimmst allen Dingen die Grenze, du öffnest den Kerker von Raum und Zeit, Du hebst das Beschränkte ins Unbeschränkte;

or in these lines:

Im Leben stehen wir immer nur aussen, es ist nichts als Sehnsucht; im Tode sind wir innen, er ist Erfüllung.

The author of the unique story, "Briefe vom Land," which a year or two ago attracted no little attention, has published a volume of "Frühlingslieder" (Munich: Albert Langen), which in spite of the well-worn title, bear the stamp of a distinct individuality. The movement of Ehrler's verse is simple and liquid; his poems crave translation into music, and one can imagine that Robert Franz would have turned them into gems of song. The earth in spring is the frame that holds these love lyrics together. They are neither erotic nor sentimental, but full of a tender, deep feeling, of thoughtful lines and original images, as in the following example:

Unsre Uhr hat einen Zauberschlag.
Horch, sie füllt die Stunde und den Tag.
Was den anderen zerrinnt,
Immerfort uns erst beginnt.

The most talked-of poet in Germany to-day is a man who, until a few years ago, was living the life of an unskilled workingman, handicapped by tuberculosis, yet eagerly taking any job that would provide for his daily wants. But from beneath the burden of toil and disease the soul of Alfons Petzold soared upward towards the vision of his dreams. What difficulties he had to overcome in his hunger for knowledge and longing for beauty, he has told in a lecture recently published under the title, "Aus dem Leben und der Werkstätte eines Werdenden" (Vienna: Anzengruber Verlag). Not until a complete physical breakdown had brought with it a spiritual crisis did his craving for self-expression assert itself strongly, and Karl Henckell, whose sympathetic appreciation and friendly criticism has paved the way for not a few of the younger German poets, was one of those who stood sponsors for Petzold's début. The three little books so far published justify their faith in the poet who rose out of the midst of the people, but does not exclusively write for the people. The book which has come from his pen this year, "Heimat Welt" (Wiener Volksbuchhandlung, Ignaz Brand & Co.), bears evidence of his genuine feeling for the essence of real poetry. There is not one line in the sixty pages that sacrifices sense to sound; matter and manner are admirably balanced. Every one of the little lyrics and of the longer prose poems is an organic entity. The most remarkable feature of his book is its wholesome spirit. The man who up to his thirtieth year had known nothing but suffering and want, bears his fate no grudge; he sees beyond the confines of his own misery-laden life the wealth and the beauty of the world, and cheers his fellow-toilers with this

HYMNE.

Fühlt es, ihr Brüder und Schwestern, dass ihr nichts Totes streift,
Was auch eure schaffende Hand ergreift.
In eurer Faust wird alles lebendig, was scheinbar tot;
Metalle, Gestein, Holz, Perlen, Selde wie Brot.

Dort, wo Hände schaffen mit Stoss und Schlag, Erneut sich der Schöpfung erster glorreicher Zeugungstag.

This hopeful acceptance gives the book a constructive value. In the love of nature Petzold finds the source of joys that make up for privations. Out of this love he sings in the poem called

NAECHTLICHE WEISHEIT.

Bruder, der Tag ist weisheitstumm,
Reden kann nur die Nacht.
Der Lärm des Tages, sein Stimmengesumm,
Hat noch keinen zum grossen Propheten gemacht.

Alle, die Gott erkor,
Zu künden das Wort und die Tat,
Reichten den heiligen Nächten das Ohr,
In denen kein Ton den lauschenden Sinnen naht.

In ihnen wird das Licht
Der Sterne zum göttlichen Psalm,
Den das Herz der wirkenden Ewigkeit spricht
Zu dem Baum, dem Stein und dem schwelgenden Halm.

Auch zu dir, wenn du gehst
Hinein in die nächtliche Welt,
Und unter der Kanzel des Himmels stehst,
Lauschend dem Psalm, der die Seelen erhellt.

SWISS NOTES.

Neuchâtel, September 10.

The Egyptian students at the University of Geneva have protested because their Government proposed to send agents to supervise their studies. They declare that this means the appointment of a kind of political police, and that they will not submit to such direction. The Swiss authorities, after investigating the complaint, report that up to the present time there is no police agent at Geneva. There are many Egyptians studying in Switzerland, and at the University of Lausanne an Egyptian Society, named Misr, has its headquarters. Thus far, the utterances of its members have been quite harmless. They are loyal to the Khedival Government, and while some of them look for the independence of their country, there does not seem to be any revolutionary tendency among them.

A valuable book on Egypt, "Histoire de la civilisation égyptienne," has lately appeared. The author is Professor Jéquier, of the University of Neuchâtel, who, besides being a learned Egyptologist, has done important practical work in directing researches by excavation. His book is a useful introduction to the subject of which it treats. The account of Egyptian progress from the Stone Age to the time of Alexander the Great is clear and concise, representing faithfully and agreeably the essential features of Egyptian culture.

At the village of Malvaglia, in the Canton Ticino, is a parish church of the sixteenth century which occupies the site of an ancient Christian church, and of a still older structure, probably a Roman temple. In the course of repairing the present building workmen have come upon some early frescoes, and in the space between the old walls and the new have been found many tombs, some pagan, some Christian. The researches still continue.

A somewhat radical change in the foreign relations of the Swiss Government has just been proposed in an initiative presented at Berne bearing 62,000 signatures, the object of which is to require that all treaties of a permanent kind shall be submitted before their ratification to the referendum. Most of the signers are inhabitants of the French cantons. It is proposed to add to the Federal Constitution the following clause:

International treaties concluded for an indeterminate period or for more than fifteen years are also submitted to the people for adoption or rejection if the demand be made by 30,000 electors.

The motive of this action is the uneasiness manifest in many parts of Switzerland at the increasing "Germanization" of the nation. Ever since the ratification of the St. Gothard Convention by the Berne Goverment a large part of the press has been insisting that the neutrality of Switzerland was threatened. It is pointed out that the national industries and commerce are passing rapidly into the hands of Germans. Germans own the principal hotels, where most of the employees are of that nationality. The chief organ of the Swiss Government, Der Bund, is distinctly Teutonic in its sympathies. On the Federal Topographical Bureau are three Germans and two Austrians, and a Swiss publisher has been expelled, without cause, it is said, from Strassburg. The Kaiser's visit last year was regarded with suspicion and disfavor in the French-speaking cantons. Even Italy has been accused of covetous plans, and protests were made against the presence at the manœuvres this year of Gen. Bompiani and a large staff of Italian officers, for fear they might get a glimpse of the Alpine fortifications. The French press has done a great deal to foster this uneasiness, and the Swiss fear some further surrender on the part of their Federal Government. At present there is only one member from La Suisse Romande on the Federal Council. The time is not far distant when Switzerland will see its territory intersected by the great waterways which will unite the Rhine with the Rhone and with the Danube, giving direct traffic by water with Marseilles, the northern ports, and the Austrian commercial centres. It is doubtful whether this initiative will be successful, for at the time of the Gothard ratification the Swiss authorities were deaf to the protestations of the large Landesgemeinde held at Berne. The financing and regulation of these international arteries of trade undoubtedly put a burden of responsibility upon the Swiss Government.

It was discovered not long ago, while improving some buildings in Geneva in the Rue des Délices, that an interesting landmark was destroyed. This was the house which was at one time the residence of Voltaire. Surrounded by a large garden, it was called the "Château of Voltaire." Behind it was a theatre which was afterwards converted into a dwelling. Until about thirty years ago the interior remained as it was in Voltaire's time, even to the decorations and some of the properties. M. Reber, of Geneva, who saw it in 1885, expressed his regret that the place was not better known and better preserved. "But," he says, "people do not ordinarily like to be told what they ought to do."

Women are acquiring at least ecclesiastical rights in the canton of Grisons. At the last meeting of the Swiss Protestant ministers it was announced that the parishes of that region may grant the vote to women, provided two-thirds of the latter demand it. The authorities may, if they please, ordain women to the ministry. This is progressive policy for a canton which prohibits motor cars from desecrating its territory.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

There is in the Harvard Library a copy of what is evidently the only edition of "The School for Scandal," as published in 1779, two years after the performance of Sheridan's play. It is characterized in the Biographica Dramatica as "a paltry catch-penny, intended to be imposed on the public as the genuine production of Mr. Sheridan." The play possesses no dramatic merit and would not deserve notice but for the unabashed conveying of its title and dramatis personæ from Sheridan and for the curious nature of its contents. The text owes virtually nothing to the earlier comedy, and it is neither a burlesque nor an imitation. The dramatis personæ and the suppositious actors follow as in the text; I have added the real persons for whom they stand:

Charles.....	Mr. King.....	George III
Joseph Surface	Lord Thane...	Earl of Bute.
Crabtree.....	Lord Rubicon.	Chancellor Thurlow.
Sir Benjamin Backbite....	Lord Minden..	Germaine, Viscount Sackville.
Sir Oliver.....	Lord Sh-lb-ne.	Lord Shelburne.
Moses.....	Lord Boreas...	Lord North.
Snake.....	Signor Frazerino	Unidentified.

The play deals with the American War of Independence and the political mismanagement and corruption in England. Charles is represented as having been completely under the influence of Joseph, but now as determined to shake off the yoke. He has just heard of the taking of one of his "sugar houses" in his "western estate" by his "perfidious foe," apparently the capture of Dominica by the French Governor of Martinique. But Joseph distracts his attention by showing him "a new invented chymical paper that is proof against fire and water," just as George III was actually interested in the non-combustible wood of Mr. Hartley's house in Wimbleton Common. While Charles is testing the paper and expressing his admiration at the invention, more disasters are reported: "Sir Harry Clatter [Sir Henry Clinton] is repulsed with great loss of men in his expedition up Boreas River [North or Hudson River] on a foraging party." Since the news is not official and is only a newspaper report, Charles refuses to believe it; and as a matter of fact it was not true, for Clinton's marauding expeditions from New York in 1778 were all too successful. Then comes official news of the capture of St. Petite and Mignonette (St. Pierre and Miquelon, which were actually destroyed by Gov. Montague, of Newfoundland, in 1778). Joseph can now easily assure Charles that what Lord and General Quomodo (Lord Admiral and General Howe) could not effect will be accomplished by Sir Harry Clatter and Admiral Boisterous (Byron), and that even if Occidentia (America) were never regained, it would be no great loss, since it "fosters a nest of hypocritical cheats and wicked incendiaries." So Charles is as much under Joseph's thumb as ever.

It is "on the eve of opening the two kennels" (the houses of Parliament), and Moses is worried to know how to silence the "hounds of opposition." Snake, whom I cannot identify, has "dished up for the hum" (the debate) reports of murderous atrocities committed by the Gasconades (the French) at the capture of the sugar house in order that the tenants may forget their loss in their renewed hatred of the Gasconades. Clatter's retreat is reported as a victory, and the importance of St. Petite and Mignonette is vastly magnified, both as a loss to the Gasconades and as a gain to the English. Snake also writes puffs of Moses for the newspapers, to the disparagement of Backbite, General Flourish (Burgoyne), whose surrender will "soon be sifted to the bottom in the lower kennel," and of Jemmy Twitcher (Earl of Sandwich, the Lord of the Admiralty), who was blamed for the escape of the French fleet.

The prospects of success are not very bright. Joseph's only hope is in more troops, to be got from Mrs. Catherine (Catherine of Russia), from the German 'squires, and from home. Crabtree has lost faith in military leaders; "little Tommy" (Gen. Thomas Gage) failed to quell the riot; General Quomodo (Howe) took a couple of towns (New York and Philadelphia), and was obliged to give one of them up (Philadelphia, as a matter of fact, was evacuated by Clinton in 1778; Boston by Howe in 1776); his brother's attempt at peace failed; Governor Insolence (Governor Johnstone) used improper means to influence the colonists to come to terms, and he was sent home in disgrace. Furthermore, there is no money, and Twitcher (Sandwich) has stirred up the kennels by fomenting the fracas between Sir Hugh Splice-rope (Sir Hugh Palisser) and Admiral Handsomely (Admiral Keppel). Moses raises a million on paper by taxing, among other objects, newspapers, cats, lapdogs, gentlemen that wear their hair tied, and clergymen that have above £300 a year.

Backbite seeks to exonerate himself from all blame for Flourish's disaster (Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga), admits that he kept Flourish from the King's presence, and that he advised sending Flourish back to his imprisoned army, and writes a scurrilous attack on Moses. He and the disreputable Twitcher are partners in a league offensive and defensive. The situation is deplorable, so corrupt and antagonistic are all of Charles's advisers. Consequently, our author seeks to anticipate history by having Charles summon Sir Oliver and offer him Moses's place. This Sir Oliver accepts after assuring the King that his advisers are a "set of fools and knaves." The whole junto is discarded, and the way is opened to a "treaty with your western servants" and an immediate cessation of hostilities. The actual end was, however, different.

UNWHOLESOME FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: However old-fashioned the deadly parallel may be, I crave permission to offer one to your readers. For I seriously believe that the outcome of the parallelism to which I wish to draw attention is fraught with the gravest consequences for American boys and girls yet in their early teens.

A nos moutons. Any careful reader of American magazines for the past ten years must have become aware of a growing salacity in magazine fiction. It would be easy to trace the progress of this movement—to show how journal after journal has been swept within its vortex. The changes, perhaps, may be best understood in the light of a few illustrations. Ten years ago a friend of mine offered to Munsey's Magazine a story, to my mind entirely harmless; the editor, though praising it highly, rejected it with the words: "I could no more publish this in any of the Munsey magazines than I could a page of the 'Decameron.'" What Munsey would say now might be much the same; but what another prominent journal did say, when I begged my friend recently to resubmit the story, was: "If you amplify certain scenes, we can probably use this." To take another case. Ten years ago a certain publication was the vehicle for interesting pseudo-scientific tales; to-day its pages teem with "realistic studies." Again: Ten years ago one might have given to any child the local-color stories of a well-known New England writer; the heroine of her most recent novel is a nymphomaniac. True, some of the authors have laudable aims—and in no case are there wanting specious excuses for the "studies." Yet the reader of Defoe may recall the prefaces to "Roxana" and "Moll Flanders." One famous journal for women has awarded prizes for "A Girl's Most Critical Experience"; if one of the writers really had her experience, she should be treated for psychopathic ailments. Another periodical wishes to call attention to "shocking actual conditions." A third announces a campaign for "purity." One can only hope that the titillation of morbid appetites is but a subconscious reason for these crusades, and that mercenary motives are entirely below the threshold of consciousness. Yet, reason or no reason, salacity leers from page after page of these periodicals.

And the parallel? In 1669 was published in France "The Letters of a Portuguese Nun," and in 1670 the "Zayde" of Madame Lafayette. These works are pure—though scarcely virginibus puerisque. But only he who has perused the novels produced between 1680 and 1800 by authors long forgotten (but now being exhumed in European reprints) can evaluate the flood of "realistic" fiction which next burst forth. Marital problems came first—for "the enlightenment of the innocent," but from pens far removed from the delicacy of that which had indited the "Princesse de Clèves." By 1690 the problem novel was in full swing; justification of marital infidelity followed hard upon the theme of marital martyrdom. By 1710 normal material—if marital infidelity be necessarily normal—had yielded to abnormal studies; and in both France and England "memoirs, diaries, secret histories, confessions," paved the way for the matchless depictions of perversities and anomalies by the brilliant Cr——, the shameless de S——, and the analytic Br——. That the literature influenced life is an open secret to the alienist.

Another parallel. From 1800 fiction in France purified itself after the incarceration of de S—— by Napoleon, the change lasting until the epoch of Balzac and his successors. Then again there came the treatment of marital problems; and again, within a decade or two, the veering to the study of abnormality. Abominable works from gifted pens (geniuses are often perverts) can easily be cited—coincident, many of them, be it noted, with reprints from the Belgian presses of eighteenth-century pornographic studies. Amid the new flood I mention only Rachilde's "Monsieur Venus"; it is out of print.

Is it "morbid" to see some meaning in these parallels? Berlin, Paris, and London are already paying the penalty for the new fiction; and our danger is so much the greater, because of the ease with which the magazine passes our doors. Are we to have in Chicago and New York reproductions of the T—— garden in Berlin, H—— Park in London, or the Promenade E—— in Paris? That Americans are "cleaner" than men and women of other nationalities is, even if it be no illusion, scarcely a safeguard. Let these "realistic" studies be tolerated, and writers grow bolder and bolder. New authors, usually abnormal, see a path broken for the revelation of their unhappy secrets. Some youth or maiden who supposes himself or herself isolated from all mankind by uncomprehended desires realizes, as a slave does freedom, that he is not alone. Correspondence with the author ensues. Another life which might have been a martyrdom, but not a menace to society, is wrecked and wrecks yet others.

If the reader be inclined to pooh-pooh these fancies, I refer him to the fact that du B——'s eighteen volumes, scarcely cold from the press, are the textbooks of the "petits jésus" of Paris. Moreover, as a matter of fact, the voicing of abnormality has already begun in America. Not only are the foreign "studies" easily to be had. X——, under symbols quite clear to the alienist, contributes his poems to several daring magazines; Y—— has left America, because it does not appreciate "true art"; only yesterday the illustrated supplement of a Sunday newspaper contained a full account of a trial for sadism in Paris; finally, a "dying confession" printed in a popular woman's journal was obviously that of a neurasthenic lover. And so the merry race whirls on. To me, at least, it is significant that in the "Zayde" of 1670, which headed the great frenetic movement in France, there is analyzed precisely the same type of jealousy as is treated in the "dying confession" in the magazine just referred to.

In an age when Havelock Ellis's sane and helpful treatments of sex problems are in our library "Infernos," is it not food for Rabelaisian mirth that some of our "realistic" magazines are on every newsstand?

DOCTORS OF DIVINITY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some time ago (June 12) you printed a letter on "Bogus University Degrees." Attention should also be called to the abuse of the title of doctor of divinity.

I do not refer to the charge that ministers buy this title outright from bogus colleges. I doubt if anything so wicked is often done. The wrong consists in the easy fashion with which many colleges bestow this degree. The qualifications of the recipient are the least consideration. Often all that is necessary is to hang around some college, become acquainted with the president or some of the trustees, and suggest in various ways, directly or indirectly, that the title might be granted; and, finally, it will be done. This is the procedure in the granting of many of these titles. And as the better class of ministers are above this sort of thing, the degree of D.D., with many exceptions, of course, is anything but a badge either of ability or honor. I recall a number of men who in preparing for the ministry did not have the ability to complete the very moderate course of study required of ministerial candidates, yet in spite of that procured ordination and in a short time afterwards blossomed out as D.D.'s.

The harm resulting from all this comes largely from the fact that laymen in their innocence take the title seriously—as standing for superior ability. They very naturally think that this is what it means, when in fact in most cases it has no such significance whatever.

LIBRARIANS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In reply to Dr. Sanborn's letter (Nation, September 11), I beg to state that in my letters to the librarians I mentioned the list in the Biblioteca, but they refused—except the New York librarian—to check off the books in their possession. In my letter to the Boston librarian, I distinctly stated my acquaintance with the Ticknor Library Catalogue, but asked for a list of novels of chivalry not included therein.

Now I proceed to substantiate the accusation of flippancy by quoting the replies received from some of the best libraries in this country.

A request was made for François-Victor Hugo's translation of Shakespeare, which brought the reply that Victor Hugo did not write a translation but only an essay on Shakespeare. It came out later that the desired translation was in the library. A request for a copy of "Amadis of Greece" brought a copy of "Amadis of Gaul" by the next post. The book asked for was in the library. Another librarian, according to his own statement, did not have the Englische Studien, and only a reference to a printed list of periodicals kept in his town convinced him that he really had it.

Some time ago, in an article published in the thirty-third volume of the Goethe-Jahrbuch, I surmised that Goethe made use of a novel of chivalry entitled "Le Chevalier du Soleil." So I wrote to the Wolfenbüttel librarian for information whether there was a possibility of Goethe having used their copy of the book. In reply I received a letter from him stating that he himself had examined the archives and found that there was no evidence of Goethe's having borrowed their book. The Wolfenbüttel Library has 300,000 volumes and its staff consists of the following men: 1 head librarian, 1 librarian, 2 scientific helps, 1 secretary, 1 janitor, 1 fireman, who is at the same time gardener.

In conclusion, as the whole nation joined some time ago in a deliberate and systematic abuse of the Turks, I cannot resist the malice of quoting a Turkish saying: Alimin jamide sözü ajy dyr, ruz qiyametta basha tajy dyr (the word of the sage in the mosque is bitter, but at the resurrection day it is a crown to the head).

OKAKURA KAKUZO.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Students of the history of art will be interested in a reminiscence of the late Japanese critic, Okakura Kakuzo. The reticence of Far Eastern criticism in the discussion of European art, its rarity, and its independence of local and epochal prejudice, give it an especial value.

I was once fortunate enough to have the late Mr. Okakura as one of a small audience at a private lecture on Cimabue at the end of which the distinguished Oriental critic expressed himself as finding in the Franciscan dramatic art of Cimabue's time one of the profoundest manifestations of European religious feeling. He spoke to me of the emotional realism of Cimabue and the Romanesque or Italo-Byzantine group of which he is the chief as comparable in its poignancy of inner meaning with the early religious art of the critic's own Japan. He insisted upon the vigor and initiative of their form in itself as being not of decadent but rather of primitive type, nobly significant and immediately responsive to the thought, in spite of external archaisms or conventions, and without recourse to material naturalistic effect. He was especially interested to find the Cimabuesque spirit in certain works with which he was unfamiliar, as the Crucifix by Coppo at Pistoia, of which I happened to have a very fine old photograph at hand. The enthusiasm of his comment seemed, at a time when the personality of Cimabue and the traditional importance of the movement represented by that artist were much assailed by a certain school of art historians, to confirm the opinion of Dante and other contemporary observers as to the pregnancy of early Florentine painting before Giotto's day. THE "LATIN LADDER."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your otherwise fair review of my book (Nation, September 11) there appear three errors of statement in the following language: "In the 'Latin Ladder' . . . we have the piecemeal presentation of forms, with verbs and nouns alternating, only three cases, nominative, genitive, and accusative, being given in the first twenty-one lessons."

(1) A glance will show that the dative and the ablative are introduced in lesson (chapter) 11. (2) In part ii the forms are given in their entirety and in the orderly sequence of the grammars. (3) Nowhere in the book do nouns and verbs alternate except in the first few chapters of the book.

With regard to error No. 2, your reviewer was doubtless misled by the fact that in part ii every chapter on forms is followed by a chapter on syntax. This was done to avoid monotony, for, as certain adults enjoy their coffee most with intervals between cups, so the young find their appetites whetted by a variety in the presentation of grammatical facts.

Robt. W. Tunstall.

The Tome School, September 13.

[For "twenty-one" should be read "ten." Piecemeal or fragmentary presentation of forms is usually confined in recent textbooks to the earlier lessons, complete paradigms appearing naturally as soon as the pupil has got well under way. While not explicitly stated, most teachers would assume this as true of this book also.—The Reviewer.]

Literature

SCHURZ, THE ORATOR AND PATRIOT.—II.

Never was the reproach of inconsistency more unjustly levelled at a public man than at Schurz. His ideas of political liberty and liberty of conscience remained unchanged from the days of 1848 to his last hour. Again and again the note of true consistency in political life rings in Schurz's public utterances. In a speech on Political Disabilities, delivered in the Senate in December, 1870, he said:

I am well aware that political parties are necessary, and that to make them live a certain drill and discipline are needed. I also appreciate the necessity of compromising on minor points inside of a party, for the purpose of securing strong and hearty coöperation in the furtherance of greater ends. A party may not satisfy me in every respect, but I may belong to it because it approaches my ideal more closely than any other. But I have never been able to look up to a party as a deity that has supernatural claims upon my veneration. To me my party has never been anything else than an organization of men gotten up for the purpose of carrying certain principles into living reality, or of promoting the execution of certain measures of public good. This object of the organization has always been to my mind the first, nay, the only, thing of real importance, and I look upon all other so-called party interests as absolutely secondary to it. "My party, right or wrong" is, therefore, a cry which I never was and never shall be able to appreciate.

Schurz's mastery of financial questions became manifest at an early stage of his Senatorial career. Like Alexander Hamilton and Gallatin, the only two American statesmen of foreign birth with whom he may be compared, he viewed economic problems in their constitutional and historical relations, and he was particularly successful in investing the dry facts of finance with a picturesque interest. He understood the art of holding up to public ridicule the ignorant pretensions of financial quacks, as when, in his address on "Currency and National Banks," delivered in the Senate, February 27, 1874, he quoted from Marco Polo's Travels, to show that Senator Morton's "progressive" idea of an irredeemable paper currency originated in China, in the ninth century of our era. His power of sarcasm served him equally in his numerous addresses on Civil Service Reform. That his picture (in a speech delivered in the Senate in 1871) of the newly inaugurated President, his Cabinet Ministers, and heads of bureaus all frantically busy, not in mapping out administrative policies, but in taking to pieces the whole machinery of government, and trying to stem the tide of hungry office seekers—that all this is not strictly true to-day is due in a greater measure to Schurz himself than, with the possible exception of George William Curtis, to any other man in the country. Schurz was a dangerous antagonist to provoke, as the Camerons, Mortons, and other Senators found out to their discomfiture, in debate with him. He was no less effective as a letter-writer. His reply, in 1897, to Senator Gallinger, who had spoken of Schurz's "political obscurity," reminds one of Lessing's scornful rejoinder to Professor and Privy Councillor Klotz:

Senator, is it not cruel, on your part, to taunt me with my "obscurity"? Nature and fortune are sparing with their choicest gifts. On you they have lavished a rare combination of genius and success. The great and powerful of this world should at least be generous enough not to scoff at the feeble and insignificant. You are a genuine celebrity. Your noble defiance of President Harrison on account of a Consulship, of which your biographers tell us, and your valiant battles for post offices and revenue places, have carried your fame into the remotest corners of New Hampshire. The fearless statesmanship of your attack on the "hopping test" in the Senate has made your colleagues and many other people prick up their ears with amused curiosity. The stranger in the Senate gallery, directory in hand, easily identifies you on the floor of the Chamber as the occupant of chair No. 7. Having been a member of the Senate myself, I know what such triumphs mean. No wonder you are proud. But do not let the pride of your greatness, however just, harden your heart against ordinary mortals. Everybody loves fame. You have it in abundance. Why do you blame me for coveting a little of it?

When Schurz became a citizen of New York he lent all his accustomed zeal to the betterment of municipal politics. Tammany Hall was in Schurz's eyes the sum of all the evils that afflict municipal government, but he never overestimated (as not a few good Democrats do), the power of Tammany in national politics. In 1884 Schurz wrote to Bayard:

There are only two possible Democratic candidates for whom that vote [the independent] can be counted upon—you and Cleveland. The nomination of either of you would make success reasonably sure. Cleveland's enemies say that he cannot carry New York on account of the hostility of Tammany. This is nonsense. What Tammany's proclaimed hostility and friendship respectively effect has been seen in the cases of Tilden and of Hancock. The hostility of Tammany would very largely increase the independent vote for Cleveland. I am sure he would carry the State by an immense majority. Your enemies say that you cannot be elected on account of your Dover speech. This is nonsense, also. The independent Republicans who have revolted against Blaine understand that speech and do not care anything about it. What begins to tell more against you is the apparent friendship of Tammany.

Not the least of Schurz's services to this country was his interpreting to us what is best in German thought and feeling, just as he furnished to Germany a conspicuous example of the highest ideals of American citizenship. There are very few instances, in politics or literature, of German-born citizens of any land mastering so completely the language of their adopted country, and entering so fully into its thoughts and traditions. Not even the encyclopædist Grimm became more completely a Frenchman than Schurz became an American. But, unlike so many other American citizens of foreign birth, he held his mother-tongue sacred, and, extraordinary as his command of English was, the accents of his rich voice were never more persuasive than when he spoke in the language of Schiller and Goethe.

It may be admitted that Schurz's speeches, when read so many years after their delivery, betray at times a certain diffuseness, resulting from the Socratic method which he often employed with such telling effect. He enjoyed vanquishing his opponents by first displaying their arguments and then, step by step, refuting them, as it were, out of their own mouths. Viewed in its purely literary aspect, this method has its faults, as has often been pointed out. Sainte-Beuve, apropos of Franklin, wittily spoke of: "Cette méthode un peu scotique et sophistique, à laquelle Socrate lui-même ne me paraît pas avoir entièrement échappé."

That Schurz will live in our history as one of the statesmen whose personal influence and example at critical times were far-reaching is certain. Whether his speeches, however, will be read as mere literature—as are, for instance, those of Webster in this country and of John Bright in England—is open to question. The predominant note in Schurz's speeches was argumentative and philosophic rather than imaginative and passionate. Only the great masters whose highest flights combine all these characteristics move later generations. Among moderns, Burke alone is still potent in his influence on political thinkers. Schurz's purely literary gifts, however, were considerable, and his life of Henry Clay possesses permanent value of a very high order.

That the inconsistency with which the shallow judgment of politicians so often reproached Schurz was really his crowning merit has been made sufficiently plain. Throughout his career, as orator, Senator, and Cabinet officer, Carl Schurz was guided by one principle—independence of action, when to be true to the party meant to be false to the country. That his brilliant abilities did not adorn the Senate for more than one term was a matter of regret even to his political adversaries. While there he set a standard of rhetorical excellence which none of his successors approached, and very few men in the entire history of the Senate ever surpassed. In his fearless disregard of partisan commands, in his absolute candor of judgment, he stands alone. His retirement from the Senate bore no personal sting to him. He never had to console himself, as Cicero did when kept from the disputes of the Senate, with the thought: "Nam aut defendissem quod non placeret, aut defuissem quod non oporteret."

If further proof were needed of what those men thought of Carl Schurz by whose judgment the world abides, let it come in the words of James Bryce. On the occasion of Schurz's attaining his seventieth year, Mr. Bryce wrote to him:

> Will you let me have the pleasure of adding my congratulations on your birthday, and expressing to you my sincere admiration for the consistent courage, rectitude, and dignity of your public career? You have been one of the few who have in politics thought always first of truth and of duty, and have never sacrificed your principles to your interests, who have always pointed out high ideals to your fellow citizens while following them yourself.

Schurz's amiable personal characteristics, unconsciously revealed in his "Reminiscences," live in the memory of those who knew him best. The relentless censor of political immorality was throughout life a man full of the joy of living. "It is fortunate for me, yes, for us both," Schurz wrote to his wife in 1855, "that I possess such an inexhaustible gayety of spirits"; and the editor of the volumes before us has elsewhere spoken of the cheerfulness of his old age, of "the geniality that pervaded his private life."

All in all, in summing up the characteristics of the man, we are tempted to apply to him his own words about Benjamin Franklin:

> He was a virtuous man, earnestly, methodically so; but his was not that straitlaced and forbidding kind of virtue which looks with a stern and sour eye upon human weakness and at every worldly enjoyment and pleasure. His was a thoroughly human, sympathetic, merry, lovable virtue—a virtue that nobody would be afraid of and that everybody would not only understand and esteem, but enjoy.

CURRENT FICTION.

Otherwise Phyllis. By Meredith Nicholson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

This is a "Hoosier chronicle" of richer quality than Mr. Nicholson's recent story of that title. This writer is honestly, if somewhat self-consciously, a product of the soil; he chooses to live and write in terms of Indiana. His Indiana is not the mushroom growth of Eastern fancy, but a land with a past of which it is proud. It has its old families, its traditions, its body of local doctrine: its personality, in short, worthy to be studied and set forth in song and story. And it has, of course, its group of skilful writers, who have already done much towards sketching that personality in black and white. The most characteristic trait of the group, perhaps, is its sober intention to be realistic, and its irresistible impulse to be romantic. "The Hoosier Chronicle," it will be recalled, made accurate record of Hoosier social types, manners, and speech: and at bottom was a roaring melodrama. There is no long-lost daughter in the present narrative, and its prodigal mother is clear of staginess: there is, to be sure, a villain of the old school.

Mr. Nicholson's town of Montgomery is described with affectionate care, with indulgence for its foibles, with a smile of intimate understanding. Two families have been particularly prominent there for many years: the Montgomerys of that ilk, and the Holtons. Lois Montgomery has married a Kirkwood, a promising lawyer and a man of serious purposes. Lois is a butterfly, not bad but irresponsible; and in search of happiness elopes with a Holton, the black sheep of the Holtons, leaving her baby daughter Phyllis to the care of the forlorn Kirkwood. The narrative proper begins at the moment when Phyllis emerges from girlhood into womanhood. She has no wish so to emerge, is a creature of high spirits and wide sympathies, is, indeed, a young person of amazing powers, a sort of dea ex machina for protesting but spellbound Montgomery. Frankly, whether the reader finds charm in the story as a whole will depend upon his relish for the middle Western idea of maidenly fascination. Phyllis is a tom-boy, a practical joker, a woman of the world. There is not a shrinking atom in her make-up; she is a relentless critic and complacent adviser of mankind, and is ready and able to do him physical injury as occasion may require. Her racy and slangy speech expresses the exuberance and effervescence of her nature. She is not quite coarse, but the notion of restraint is foreign to her, and the real dignity of her character is not reflected in her manner. Mr. Nicholson asserts more than once that she is not "fresh," and we can believe that she is not, to him. But one has to feel her charm in spite of her manners, to become acclimated to her.

And one does feel the charm of Phyllis. The return of her mother to Montgomery, and ensuing complications, test her thoroughly, and she passes the test in no commonplace way. Phyllis, her mother, her father, Uncle Amzi, the Bartlett sisters, are all such real persons—and Phyllis's solid Fred Holton should not be forgotten—that the conventional drawing of the villain and of Phyllis's three aunts is the more conspicuous. Phyllis herself "carries" the story.

David Malcolm. By Nelson Lloyd. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

David Malcolm's early history is more interesting than his later years. Up to the time when he graduates from McGraw, a poor but proud university somewhere in the wilds of Pennsylvania, his life has been a succession of new horizons. The first of these was opened for him by the cloud-gazing Professor, who boasted no classroom but his weedy patch of ground. The Professor was the unpractical brother of Rufus Blight, who "never had a real idea," but went to conquer the county town, and, having done it, by giving a prize with every pound of tea, proceeded in time to Pittsburgh and the top rounds of material success. Malcolm's next enlargement of view came from Boller of '89, the Beau Brummel of McGraw, whom he ultimately out-distanced in sartorial attainments, and also in winning from Gladys Todd, daughter of the president of the university, the promise of her hand. It was Boller of '89, again, who put the idea of newspaper work into Malcolm's mind. And so it was that he gave up Malcolmville, and even Harlansburg, for New York. One thread that still bound him to his native place was his memory of Penelope Blight, daughter of the cloud-gazing Professor. He had not seen her since that terrible day when she became the ward of her Pittsburgh uncle, passing to affluence—and oblivion. In New York he meets her again, and from here the story tends to lapse into conventionality. Moreover, in this part of the tale it is impossible to acquit Malcolm, who throughout is his own Boswell, of obtuseness. It is Malcolm's and Penelope's brief childhood friendship that impresses itself on one's imagination.

The Lady and the Pirate. By Emerson Hough: Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co.

Granted to this novel such merit as novelty of theme may confer. A middle-aged recluse who joins the expedition of two runaway boys playing pirate is no ordinary hero. His pursuit and forcible capture of the lady of his dreams is not, in these days, a commonplace exploit. The sober and domesticated river Mississippi is seldom, we fancy, the scene of such incidents as are here alleged. But away with the probabilities: this is fiction, and fiction of the braver sort. Given the premises that there are still lovers so dashing, and maids so amenable, what conclusion may fairly be doubted? Put yourself in the hero's place. Admit that you have parted from the one woman in the world, that you have retired from that world, eating your heart out according to the best formula, with only such solace as unlimited wealth and leisure may afford. You are fishing your private trout-stream one day, when the pirate-urchins appear and challenge you. What do you do?—give them a lecture and send them back to their parents? By no means. Youth is re-born in you; you enter into the spirit of their enterprise. Perceiving that you have lived foolishly and feebly, you resolve to be strong and piratical. In brief, you take a motor-boat and pursue the lost lady half the length of the Mississippi; take possession of the yacht in which she is voyaging; and, by way of kidnapping, shipwreck, and other red-blooded experiences, steer her successfully into the port of wedlock. Unluckily (since this seems intended as a story for adults) few readers beyond the schoolboy age will be led by the narrative to fancy themselves in the hero's place.

Unpath'd Waters. By Frank Harris. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

The suggestion of the title is borne out by a certain oddity in these tales and sketches. They have unexpectedness, not charm. Two or three of them are even startling. "The Miracle of the Stigma" represents Jesus as surviving the crucifixion, and under the name Joshua pursuing his trade of carpenter in Cesarea. A quiet, self-effacing man, he is tolerated for his industry, despite his indifference to religion. He marries, not unhappily, until apostles of the new Christian faith visit Cesarea. The young wife becomes a convert, but the carpenter holds aloof. At last, on the coming of Paul with his narrow zeal and fierce eloquence, she leaves her husband. He dies, and when the Holy Stigmata are found upon his hands and feet and side, Paul interprets it as a miracle that the last unbeliever in Cesarea should have been so marked, as a sign to the world, with the sacred symbols. Several other tales have to do with the type of enthusiast which is born to failure, in the worldly sense. A second group deals satirically with the tricks of finance. The longest, least agreeable, and in a way most striking story in the book is called "An English Saint," a ruthless sketch of the genesis and growth of a successful hypocrite.

LEADERS OF THOUGHT IN FRANCE.

French Prophets of Yesterday: A Study of Religious Thought under the Second Empire. By Albert Leon Guérard. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $4 net.

Professor Guérard's volume is a welcome example of that scholarship of ideas which must be chiefly counted on at present to give respectability to both our criticism and our teaching of literature. "The work is offered," he says, "as a tribute of the author's love for France, the land of his birth; for England, where he grew to conscious manhood, and for America, the home of his choice." As a result, no doubt, of this varied experience he joins a perfect appreciation of the French point of view to an unusual command of English idiom. The style of the book is throughout not merely correct, but spirited. He conceives of his subject so broadly as to include not only the religious thought of the Second Empire, but its origins in the earlier romantic movement as well as its prolongation in the Third Republic down to the present day. The formative influences upon the temper of the age that Professor Guérard studies especially are Protestantism, Catholicism, romantic humanitarianism, and science.

Among Protestants he takes Guizot as a type of the conservative, the apostle of impossible compromises, who would have stopped religious evolution about the middle of the sixteenth century, political evolution about 1830. "Thus his political life ended in disaster, his religious life in a victory more bitter than many defeats." To the majestic immobility of Guizot Professor Guérard opposes the painful evolution of Scherer from protestant orthodoxy, to relativism and utter disbelief. Quinet is presented as a wandering spirit, too much of a protestant bent on individual salvation, to believe in sheer romantic humanitarianism, and too much of a free-thinker to be a Christian. In general, Professor Guérard treats French Protestantism as a survival of little effective influence during the period of his survey.

The French Catholicism of his period, as Professor Guérard makes clear, is saturated with romantic tendencies. The ultimate refinements of Chateaubriand's religiosity are perhaps to be found in "satanic" figures like Baudelaire and Barbey d'Aurevilly. Romantic elements are also traced in Lamennais, Lacordaire, Gratry, and the mystical Hello. It is not clear whether the virulent polemist, Louis Veuillot, speaks as a Christian or Rousseauistic obscurantist when he declares that "the future belongs to the dirty nations" and augurs well from this point of view for the Russians. The growth of ultramontane influences during the period finally resulted in the discomfiture of "liberal" Catholics like Montalembert, and led to the open break of Loyson (le père Hyacinthe) with the Church. The total outcome was "an undeniable lowering in the character of French Catholicism, a recrudescence of materialistic superstitions, the uncritical acceptance of doubtful miracles, a tone of bitter arrogance in controversy, charity sneered at, and faith reduced to blind obedience."

Among romantic humanitarians Professor Guérard pays special attention to Hugo and Michelet. Is romantic humanitarianism a religion or a pseudo-religion? This is the crucial question which is constantly occurring to one in reading this book, and to which it may be doubted whether the author has given a satisfying answer. Romantic humanitarianism as professed by Hugo and Michelet, says Professor Guérard, "has all the elements of religion—faith, hope, and charity." How about humility? What is there in common between faith conceived as a regenerative principle in the life of the individual and faith in the future progress of humanity? It is only by juggling with words that one can connect closely the faith of a Hugo with that of a Paul. Professor Guérard says that Hugo's poem, "The Toad," is "perfect." This poem culminates in the assertion that an ass that takes a step aside in order to avoid crushing a toad is "greater than Socrates and greater than Plato." Those who hold that the highest thing in life is unselective sympathy, may discover perfection in such a passage. To others it will seem only the perfection of nonsense.

The reason of Professor Guérard's tenderness towards the emotionalists may appear in his assertion that "unless one accept a historical revelation, the only alternative to emotional religion is Voltairianism." In other words, there is no region of religious insight superior to both the intellect and the emotions and independent of historical revelation. If Professor Guérard errs here it is only fair to say that he errs with the whole age, not only in France, but elsewhere. The currents of romantic humanitarianism are in reality running much more strongly in America to-day than in France, and an increasing number of American readers will listen to him sympathetically when he speaks of "the spiritual grandeur of Socialism at its best," and asserts that "humanitarianism remains the spiritual backbone of France." (How, by the way, can expansive emotionalism supply a backbone to anything?)

Professor Guérard is, as a matter of fact, perfectly aware of the weakness of romantic humanitarianism: it offers too large an opening for the ironist and the cynic. He points out correctly that the materialistic tone of the Second Empire was due even less to the spread of Darwinism and like doctrines than to the cynicism that ensued upon the humanitarian fiasco of 1848. Renan is perhaps the best type of the disillusioned humanitarian who came to treat even his own faith ironically; and to him Professor Guérard devotes his longest and most carefully wrought chapter. One is struck by the leniency of his treatment of Renan as compared with the severity of his handling of Taine. He quotes with approval the saying that Taine was an esprit faux. To many the mind of Renan will seem superior in subtlety rather than in soundness to that of Taine—especially after 1870. "The publication of 'The Future of Science' at the end of his career," says Professor Guérard, "showed that Renan's mind, unlike Taine's, had righted itself and that the cure was complete." But the extreme expressions of the "dilettanteism" against which the younger generation in France is now reacting so briskly are found in the writings of the last ten years of Renan's life. (See especially his "Feuilles détachées.")

The situation in France to-day, says Professor Guérard in his closing chapter, has not changed materially since the end of the Second Empire: there is the same irreducible opposition between naturalism and supernaturalism. The forms in which this opposition manifests itself would seem to the outsider to be more political than religious. Here at the end as elsewhere in the book the reviewer is haunted by the feeling that Professor Guérard has not worked out a sufficiently clear preliminary definition in his own mind of the nature of true religion. Hence a certain vagueness and inconclusiveness. To offset this fault, if it be one, the book has, in addition to its prime virtue of readableness, another eminent merit: it gives the facts (including the psychological facts) with such fulness and accuracy that the reader is as a rule put in a position to draw his own conclusions.

The Duab of Turkestan: A Physiographic Sketch and Account of Some Travels. By W. Rickmer Rickmers. With 207 maps, diagrams, and other illustrations. Cambridge University Press (University of Chicago Press, agents). $9 net.

A valuable book by an able scholar, and written in a style which makes its technical contributions pleasant reading—that, in a few words, may indicate the significance of this important volume.

The word "Duab" of the title denotes the land between the "two rivers" (du ab), Oxus and Jaxartes, in Central Asia. Exception might be taken to the adoption in the volume of the spelling of "Turkestan" (with an e), though it is the accepted English method of rendering the name of this region beyond the Caspian Sea, which philologists prefer to write as Turkistan as a more precise orthographic representation of the designation of the Turki land.

As to geographic boundaries, the author rightly emphasizes the fact that "what is known as Turkestan is an atmosphere." Yet Hamlet's cloud-comment to Polonius, "very like a whale," might serve to define roughly the territorial contour of this badly limited but physiographically important region near the Roof of the World. A glimpse at the outline map figured on the second page of the volume—the first of many excellent sketches and scientific drawings that supplement the photographic illustrations—would show the whale's head as spouting into the Sea of Aral, east of the Caspian, its belly as swallowing the products of most of the now Russian cities of Turkestan, and its flange-like tail as spreading one fluke towards the upper borders of India, while the other sweeps eastward towards Tibet and China.

Mr. Rickmers is a scholar qualified in high degree to represent British standards of research in this Asiatic Russian realm, and he shows his scientific acumen not only in the domain of physiography as a student of physical geography, geology, cartography, but also as an ethnologist and a true traveller, who observes and knows how to appreciate the spirit of the people whose land and customs he has made better known by his work. In every chapter lessons may be learned regarding a sympathetic treatment of the native folk among whom for the time an explorer's lot may be cast; and in these different expeditions, made several years apart, he was pluckily accompanied by his wife and a lady friend of hers, besides having the comradeship of a keen sportsman, Douglas Carruthers, whose sharp sight has lent more than one point to accurate observation.

The centres from which the several treks were made were the great historic cities of Samarkand and Bukhara, and the range of research always covered a radius of a couple of hundred miles in different directions. Much of the region abounds in high mountains, and as the author is an expert Alpine climber, his mountaineer spirit plays a part in nearly every chapter. The technical results of many of the ascents of unscaled peaks and glacier heights form a valuable part of the scientific contribution of the different excursions recorded in the work.

A thorough description of the physical features of the Duab leads up to a careful account of that life-giving artery, the River Zarafshan ("Gold-flowing" it is called), which descends from glacial elevations to water the region and lose itself in the sands round about Bukhara before reaching the Oxus. The Russian Government in Asia will doubtless take added note of the observations made in regard to problems of irrigation and the factors of desiccation involved in all this area when its officials have in hand the present volume, which their administrative aid helped forward by extending special courtesies to the author in his explorations.

Geologically the author's eye is ever open along the route through this out-of-the-way domain, and for that reason specialists in this line will mark with interest the trend of his advance. The geographer, moreover, will not fail to observe records of altitudes, of bearings, and of critical comments or inferences, that may be used to advantage hereafter. The traveller who is accustomed to caravan life in Persia and Central Asia will find parallels from experience in the conditions pictured on the road, though he might add the wish that the investigator's routes had been indicated in red upon one or other of the useful maps appended at the end of the book.

Throughout this volume, of between five hundred and six hundred pages, there is much of humanity, much of the common-sense that is born of travel and experience in research, much of scientific investigation that can best be appreciated by those who know the Realm of the Rising Sun. And to summarize, there is an immense amount of resourceful material stored up in the eighteen chapters of the work. It is true that the archæologist may miss points which he would wish had not been overlooked; the antiquarian might lend lore from ancient texts to add color to some observations incidentally made; but both would agree that this did not come within the title and aim of the book, and would join in praise of the author's successful accomplishment of an attempt (as it is modestly called) "to combine a record of exploration with the teaching of a little elementary physiography."

Some might find fault with the technical make-up of this serviceable book. The English publishers are so skilled in turning out lightweight paper for their books that even a large tome can be easily held in the hand; but in the present volume the heavily weighted paper that was needed for combining the illustrations and letter-press on the same page, makes a ponderous volume to hold; and it does seem that some invention or device might provide for making such a book more handy.

Also, a series of one hundred and one lyrics, called "A Woman's Reliquary" and supposed to be by Dowden since he signs himself editor, will shortly come from the Cuala Press of Miss Elizabeth Yeats, sister of the poet Yeats.

The Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration offers a first prize of $200 and a second prize of $100 for the best essays on "International Peace," by undergraduate women students of any college or university in the United States; and a prize of $100 for the best essay on "International Arbitration" by an undergraduate man student of any college or university in the United States or Canada. In neither instance should the essays, which must be submitted not later than March 15, 1914, exceed 5,000 words.

The brief autobiographical notes of W. Hale White, issued by his son as "The Early Life of Mark Rutherford" (Oxford University Press), were composed only a few years ago, and reflect the grave and sad disillusions of a mind naturally radical which mark the exquisite pages also of "Pages from a Journal" and "More Pages from a Journal." Of the early events of Mr. White's life we could already conjecture a good deal from the half-autobiographical pages of the books which gave a kind of fame to the name of "Mark Rutherford," but it is pleasant to have these franker pictures of his youth in Bedford and his early manhood in London. Looking back on the results of his expulsion from a Methodistic college for unorthodoxy, he writes these pregnant words:

> It would be a mistake to suppose that the creed in which I had been brought up was or could be for ever cast away like an old garment. The beliefs of childhood and youth cannot be thus dismissed. I know that in after years I found that in a way they revived under new forms, and that I sympathized more with the Calvinistic Independency of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries than with the modern Christianity of church and chapel. At first, after the abandonment of orthodoxy, I naturally thought nothing in the old religion worth retaining, but this temper did not last long. Many mistakes may be pardoned in Puritanism in view of the earnestness with which it insists on the distinction between right and wrong. This is vital. In modern religion the path is flowery. The absence of difficulty is a sure sign that no good is being done. How far we are from the strait gate, from the way that is narrow which leadeth unto life, the way which is found only by few! The great doctrines of Puritanism are also much nearer to the facts of actual experience than we suppose.

The keynote of Mark Rutherford's musings are in those words. He was preeminently a Victorian, with the sanguine enthusiasm of the Victorians tempered by the restraint of self-knowledge, believing in reform and progress and change, but dreading the license of irresponsibility; casting off old dogmas, but holding to the moral ideas which underlay them. In his later years he felt as one belonging to a vanished world, and it is fitting that the last pages of these autobiographical notes should contain a glowing apology for the age which the present day patronizes so contemptuously. Mr. White cannot be classed with the great makers of the age he admires, but his novels have the peculiar fascination of modest veracity, and in the two little volumes of his "Journals" may be found, and will long be cherished by a few readers, some of the finest and subtlest, yet least obtrusive, reflections in modern English literature.

Many readers will be pleased to learn that Macmillans have issued the Works of Charles Lamb in an edition somewhat smaller and less expensive than that published by them a few years ago. Mr. E. V. Lucas, the editor in both cases, explains the relation between tho two editions:

This edition is the same as that in seven large volumes published between 1903 and 1905, except that it has been revised and amended and arranged in more companionable shape. Some new matter is included; some doubtful matter has been removed; and the notes, although occasionally enriched, have been reduced in number and often condensed. For completer annotation as well as for portraits and accessory illustrations, the old edition must be consulted.

The present issue is in six light volumes, each of which bears on the red cloth cover a symbolic design in gilt made by Mr. Bedford out of such details as the coats of arms of Christ's Hospital and the Inner Temple, the bells of St. Dunstan's Church, so much beloved by Lamb, and the sprite and the candles of Betty. Of the new matter introduced the most important comprises a number of letters of Charles and Mary Lamb which until recently had been inaccessible. Six hundred and eighteen letters are included, and reference is made to other letters, or abstracts of them are given, which for reasons of copyright cannot be used. There are also several poems not to be found in the large edition. As the editor remarks, "there are probably still many copies of album verses which have not yet seen the light." From the "Books for Children" have been omitted the original pictures, together with the apocryphal "Beauty and the Beast." These must be sought in the older issue. In each volume is a preface pointing out the modifications deemed necessary for this latest edition. These, when a just balance of the additions and omissions is struck, make the present work scarcely less valuable than the older.

Among the new volumes in the World's Classics, issued by the Oxford University Press, is a selection of "Poems by Byron," which, on the whole, shows good judgment on the part of the unnamed editor. We think "The Prophecy of Dante" and "The Lament of Tasso" might have given place to longer and more characteristic extracts from "Don Juan," and some will think too many of the "Hebrew Melodies" are included; but the best of Byron is here, and it is almost astonishingly good. A selection of the "Poems of Shelley," in the same library, includes "Prometheus Unbound," "The Cenci," and "Adonais," with a number of the best of his shorter pieces. Other new volumes are: "Poems of Milton," "The Entail," by John Galt, "Lizzie Leigh and Other Tales," by Elizabeth Gaskell, "Felix Holt, the Radical" and "Romola," by George Eliot, and "Lorna Doone."

Those who have delighted in Benjamin Silliman's "Journal of Travels in England, Holland, and Scotland in 1805-6" will find pleasure in the similar but shorter journal of "England in 1815" (Houghton Mifflin), by a young Boston merchant named Joseph Ballard. Whereas Silliman went to study chemistry and buy books for the Yale library, Ballard went primarily on business matters and naturally has more to say of agriculture and trade than his more learned predecessor. He noted the progress of inventions—street-lighting by gas, coal cars drawn by steam locomotives, hydraulic presses, and salt-mining works—and also the misery and squalor of the little children and their drunken parents in the new "manufactories." Besides attending church piously twice a day on Sunday, he found plenty of leisure to frequent the theatres and be mildly shocked at dancers so thinly clad "that I think a New England audience would not have tolerated them." His republican patriotism leads him to observe that the cost of keeping six cream-colored horses in the King's mews "amounts to more than President Madison's salary." The journal is well worth reading, and it is a pity his descendants in making it public should have limited it to a few hundred numbered copies at a relatively high price.

"Money Changing" (Dutton) affords Hartley Withers another opportunity to show how clearly and entertainingly he can talk on intricate and, to the ordinary person, dry subjects. This work is an introduction to the study of foreign exchange, and pertinent indeed is Mr. Withers's use of Anatole France's phrase, "La science est infaillible; mais les savants se trompent toujours." The subject taxes the clearest minds. "It is awful to read on the currency," says Walter Bagehot, "and to read on the currencies of tho nations and their prices as expressed in one another is awful with an awesomeness that is world-wido and appalling." There is, however, nothing awesome or appalling in the present work. It remains truo that in international finance things show a constant tendency to work out in defiance of established principles. "These confounded exchanges only seem to work the wrong way," once exclaimed a London bill broker. But Mr. Withers is able to point out the modifying and often obscure factors which occasion these departures from theoretical doctrine. Sound economic training and shrewd common-sense enable him to navigate treacherous seas with ease, and to calm the fears of timid souls. In this country, in particular, nothing is so terrifying to statesmen, bankers, and men of ordinary affairs as an excess of imports. But even in England, where such an excess occurs year after year, there is a manifest fear. Mr. Withers's treatment of this chimera is thoroughly typical. It introduces one to a situation which seems complicated solely because one has to keep his eyes on so many facts at the same time. Keeping an eye on easily obscured facts is a sine qua non in the study of foreign exchange. The chief merit of the work before us is that it makes it easier for us to recognize landmarks when we encounter them in the future.

J. M. Robertson's "Evolution of States" (Putnam) begins with the assertion that politics is the strife of wills on the ground of social action. From the author's own showing, that result has been far from happy. His sketch of Roman political evolution ends in darkness, and matters were no better with Greece. The Greek democracies in their different ways split upon the rock that wrecked the Roman Republic: there was no general mental development commensurate with the political problems that arose for solution, and there was no approach to sound economics. Solon prepared the ground for the democratic structure of the later Athenian polity. Floated over the first reef by him, the Athenians never found a pilot to clear the second—the principle of group-enmity. Upon that the Hellenic civilization finally foundered. The truth is, Greece fell because her children never transcended, in conception or in practice, that primary ethic of egoism in which even love for one's country is only a reflex of hate for another people. This is clear in the whole play of the astounding hatreds of Athenians for Athenians through every struggle of Athens for her life. It is the prevailing conscienceless ness, the universal lust to tyrannize, that really consummates the political dissolution. The moral for modern democracies is that to flourish they must have peace. They must sooner or later practice a scientific and humane restraint of population; they must check inequality, which is the fountain of domestic strife; and they must maintain a progressive and scientific culture. This, from the author's own admissions, is easier said than done. We journey with him along the course of Greek, Roman, and Saracen development, all the while chanting, "I passed by the walls of Balclutha; and they were desolate!" And if we fix our gaze on Italian civilization of the Middle Age and the Renaissance, we find that the "petty done" is still dwarfed by "the undone vast." Nor is it a cheerful course that we steer in traversing the seas of modern civilization. This is not preëminently an Ago of Faith, and yet it is to our faith that our author makes his final appeal. Considered as a tale that is told, that past, he declares, seems to speak of nothing but blind impulse, narrow horizons, insane satisfactions in evil achievement, grotesque miscalculation, and vain desire. He even cites Leopardi to testify that "as to all this activity, I can divine no use and no fruition." But does it not tax our credulity to be told, in the next breath, that with the science of universal evolution has come the faith in unending betterment? It will strike the reader that our author rests his case too soon.

It is hard to understand what purpose can be served by such a work as "Russia in Europe and Asia" (McClurg), by Joseph King Goodrich. Aside from some sensible comments on contemporary politics, honesty is its only merit; excerpts from tho Century Dictionary, tho Encyclopædia Britannica, and other sources almost equally obvious to persons seeking instruction on Russia, are faithfully put within quotation marks. The volume is a jumble of miscellaneous information derived from other books, supplemented by remarks based on the author's railway trips in the Russian Empire; the whole is worked up without accuracy, proportion, or literary style. At the close there is added a seven-page list of books on Russia, good, bad, and indifferent, with no indication of their comparative value.

The main stress in "The Malay Peninsula" (Scribner), by Arnold Wright and Thomas H. Reid, is laid on the record of British progress in Malaya, and the work accordingly furnishes an interesting counterpart to the "Pacification of Burma," described in these columns several months ago as a work showing the mode of introducing the pax Britannica and the resultant benefits in every way to the regions brought under English sway. The manifold disadvantages of Bencoolen as a centre for its activities led the East India Company in 1786 to turn to Penang. As the authors point out, England is largely indebted for this achievement—which marks the foundation of all the British possessions in Malaya—to the insight of Francis Light, whose merits have met with undeserved oblivion. After Penang, Malacca was occupied, next Singapore, the latter being selected as a commercial site by the famous Sir T. Stamford Raffles. The general history and development of the British States in Malaya—Wellesley, Dindings, Malacca, and Singapore—as well as of the Protected States—Kedah, Kelantan, Tringanu, and Johor—are fully indicated, and a special chapter is devoted to their legislative and administrative systems, another being given to an account of the means of communication.

A good account is furnished of the tin mines of Malaya at the present time, and it is stated that 11,118 tons of rubber, valued at £5,925,000, and furnishing employment to 227,985 laborers, was the output of Malaya in 1911. Before many years, it is estimated, the output will be 72,000 tons annually, which suggests by contrast the wasteful system in vogue in South America. Business administration is almost entirely in the hands of Europeans and Chinese; a few Parsis are prominent at Singapore. The bulk of the tin miners are Chinese; in the planting industries the great majority employed are Indians, especially Tamils. Indeed, the Indian population of Malaya increased in the decade 1901-1911 at a rate of 195.4 per cent., as contrasted with a Chinese increase of 43.7 per cent. The future of the Malay Peninsula is full of hope, and the authors are wise in deeming that its best interests lie in its incorporation with the Indian Empire. In regard to the ancient history of the region, there is room for considerable investigation, and at least a summary of what is already known should have been given—for example, the information recorded in Lassen's "Indische Alterthumskunde." Discussion of "manners, customs, and occupations" is also disappointingly meagre and lacking in first-hand information.

Reuben Thomas Durrett, at one time editor of the Louisville Daily Courier, died at his home in that town on the 17th inst. He was eighty-nine years old. Mr. Durrett was the head of the Filson Club, an organization of scientists and men of letters famous in the South. The meetings were always held in his fine old library, on the shelves of which were about 50,000 volumes—a collection of Americana which he began early in life. Mr. Durrett was educated at Georgetown College and at Brown University. He practiced law in Louisville from 1850 to 1880, and was president of the Public Library of Kentucky in 1884. He was the author of "The Life and Times of John Filson," "Historical Sketch of St. Paul's Church," and "Centenary of Kentucky."

Prof. Alfonso Gerald Newcomer, since 1891 a member of the faculty of Leland Stanford Jr. University, died last week at Palo Alto, Cal. He was born in 1864, and graduated from the University of Michigan in 1887. He was the author of "Practical Course in English Composition," "Elements of Rhetoric," and "English Literature."

Eliakum Zunser, the Yiddish poet and one of the most picturesque figures of the East Side in New York, died on Monday. He was born nearly seventy-seven years ago in Russia, where he lived until 1890. He was as popular a poet in his native land as here, but was forced to emigrate on account of the persecution of the police. His best work is represented by such songs as "The Bell and the Mail Wagon," "The Railway," "The New World," "Slaves Were We," "The Scythe," in which he urged the Jews to go back to the soil, and his play "The Sale of Joseph," said to be the first Yiddish drama. While in this country Zunser wrote songs mainly in defence of American liberty and American institutions.

Dr. James Orr, who died recently in his seventieth year, was professor of systematic theology and apologetics in the United Free Church College, Glasgow, and was the author of many books. The most notable of these is "The Christian View of God and the World."

FINE GASTRONOMY.

Food and Flavor: A Gastronomic Guide to Health and Good Living. By Henry T. Finck. Illustrations by Charles S. Chapman. New York: The Century Co. $2 net.

This is properly not a book, but a tract, a concio ad populum, a clangorous appeal to every man and every woman to mend their dietetic ways. Mr. Finck is a writer of high training and long experience; it is perfectly easy for him to be academic and to follow the canons, but he has not chosen to do this. The result is a volume about as free from "literary" savor as a book can well be. Since he has taken such a course, it is well-nigh unavoidable not to make some reflections on his performance in much the same spirit as that in which he has written.

The main thesis of the work is the paramount importance of Flavor (always with a capital F) in the consideration of food value. We are emphatically and constantly reminded that it is not the taste but the flavor which gives us our basis of judgment of the merit or demerit of food. The old dogma, de gustibus non est disputandum, must go to the wall. The very thing we are to dispute about is the question of taste, or rather of flavor. But he who discards dogmas is likely to offer other dogmas of his own, and it is quite possible that any one with the boldness to dispute our author in regard to his dietetic convictions might find a bitter adversary.

What, then, is this Flavor, this quality in food that is of such transcendent importance? Mr. Finck does not make it wholly clear, but if we understand him aright it is a sort of breathing with the mouth and tasting with the nose, or rather a combination of both. Perhaps a clear idea can be formed of what he means by taking a sip of any delicate cordial, say, chartreuse, and expelling the aroma of it from the mouth through the nose—the reverse process of smelling. That this interpretation of flavor differs from what we usually call taste and smell seems fairly evident. A cheese which is vile-smelling certainly is often of agreeable flavor, thus proving that smell and flavor are not identical. There are few tastes, as Mr. Finck shows—a taste, according to him, is either bitter, salt, sweet, sour, metallic, or alkaline. According to modern psychologists there are but four. However this may be, there certainly are no such nuances in tastes as in flavors. It is strange that he should be the first to discover so important a feature of the mystery of eating. If what he says is true, and there is no reason to doubt it, then it must be reserved for the highly-trained to get the full delights of a good dish, for it seems to be a conscious process.

Broad is the domain covered by Mr. Finck in his chase for food worthy of his best attention. Copenhagen fish, Italian pastes, German and English hams, American pie, cheese of every nation and clime—nothing is too delicate or too lowly to escape his shrewd attention provided that the food is honest and pleasing. It is true that the subject Flavor is often lost sight of, and here again Mr. Finck's long experience of quite another sort stands him in good stead. Primarily, he is a musical critic, and he knows just what to do when he seems to lose the thread of narrative. Just as we are beginning to wonder what all these charmingly informal but most instructive pages have to do with Flavor, suddenly a horn (in this case a dinner-horn) sounds in the distance, and lo! the leit-motif appears and we are once more skilfully involved in the arguments in regard to Flavor and its relations to food—the whole process is highly operatic.

Deeply informed as is the author on his subject, the book is one that the wayfaring man may read and profit thereby. In speaking, for instance, of the Italian pastes he mentions the best kinds in a very helpful way. He might have added a chapter on the arrogance and ignorance of the modern grocer, who makes up his mind what his customers ought to purchase, and then closes it to all argument. Another chapter Mr. Finck might have written entertainingly and instructively on that painfully large class in the community who don't like this and don't like that —the persons of a restricted dietary. There is so much food to be had, and most of it on the whole is so nourishing and palatable, that there is really little excuse for parents allowing their children to grow up with ill-trained and really vulgar caprices. In later life, a child, untrained in this simple but important matter, has eventually to suffer from the neglect.

Every one, we are insistently told, should eat a sour salad once a day, using more vinegar, and good vinegar at that, than is usually called for in the books. It is only necessary to walk through the "foreign" parts of any large city to be made aware that salads are by no means rich men's food. The poor really live well, if we read Mr. Finck aright—so also do some of the rich, but not all. It is the middle sort, leaning too heavily on their steaks and chops, who suffer when the prices of beef and mutton rise, for they lack knowledge and imagination, and have as yet nowhere to turn for succor, unless they enlist under Mr. Finck's banner.

In spite of some disheartening remarks at the beginning about our gastronomic conditions, towards the end of his tale Mr. Finck brightens visibly and sees a glorious dietetic future for this country. And why, indeed, should not his hopes be realized? While other countries stick for the most part to their own established dietaries, we are getting an astonishing familiarity with the foods and eating customs of all Christendom and even of heathenesse. Any day at noon in the downtown parts of all cities, you shall see stout and rosy butchers, once scornful of all food but the eternal rump steak or pork chop, now up to the eyebrows in the joyous excitement of Italian ravioli or Hungarian goulash, or German rinderbrust. Bismarck herring, Spanish omelet, the humble Chinese chop-suey, Mexican enchilada, West Indian avocados, all these and many other good things are no longer weird novelties to the American palate, and Mr. Finck cheers us with the assurance that we eat them because they have distinct and often delicious flavor. Shall we blame him if he breaks forth into ecstatic murmurings of delight? Were he not an idealist at heart, our Puritanism might revolt at his comparison of his first taste of alligator-pear to the "discovery of a new song of Schubert or Grieg, or a new painting by Titian."

Putting the French first in gastronomic matters, Mr. Finck is not subservient. He defends, for instance, the early American breakfast as against the Gallic coffee and roll, and on his unfurled standard is inscribed the word "pie" à la mort. He is, however, altogether too severe on our custom of flavoring pies. It must be that he has never yet eaten an apple pie, flavored with a leaf of rose-geranium, and served to him by an American housewife bred on the best traditions. There is still a thrill left for him if he has not eaten this sort of pie. Since he is so utterly loyal to the best of our national achievements in good dishes, it is a pity that he found no place for some eulogium on salt-fish dinners, and that even greater achievement, the New England boiled dinner, glowing with the colors of the solar spectrum. He might, too, have struck a somewhat louder string by lauding our various chowders, the greatest of which are the clam and quahaug varieties. He does, however, speak with fervor of potato-salad, "one of Germany's great contributions to the world's gastronomic treasures." His view of American cheese is gloomy, and it might be possible to quarrel with one who omits Gorgonzola from his list of the great world-cheeses. Roquefort stands at the top in his estimation.

A somewhat cheerful tone runs through the remarks on "sea food," as some of our frowzy restaurants insist upon calling it, although Mr. Finck raises the hue and cry against all frozen fish. He does not seem to make any discrimination in favor of "chilled" fish, notwithstanding the fact that such useful food as halibut and salmon can now be carried in a reasonably good condition to places where a few years ago they were virtually unknown. He makes, however, the suggestion that the innumerable ponds in this country might well be stocked, as is so extensively done in Germany. This is not the only suggestion in this remarkable work which, if followed out, might lead to the making of good livings and even of comfortable fortunes. Several of his hints, pointing towards livelihoods for women, while not wholly novel, are so strongly put that, by not telling what they are, we hope to excite the curiosity of a sex thought not to be absolutely without it. To return, not to our muttons, but to our fish, Mr. Finck believes sole to be the best kind in the "wide, wide world," though he has kindly thoughts for other kinds, and even defends eels, accepting the German variety as perfectly free from the traditional dietetic habits of this humble member of its family. So valiant a defender of an animal with as bad a reputation as the eel, naturally receives in a catholic spirit the favorable comparison made by a friend of python's liver with terrapin.

"While haddock is by no means rated among the finest fishes, finnan haddie is one of the very best of cured fishes" —thus Mr. Finck (p. 427); but it has often occurred to lovers of fish food that were haddock as scarce and high-priced as salmon or striped bass, epicures would make much of it. We do tire of trout, even when cooked in cream; but the modest haddock—a far choicer fish than cod, both as to flavor and the quality of its flesh—is what President Eliot might call "a durable satisfaction," like bread or apples. As for sole, it is a good, a most delectable fish, but has Mr. Finck ever tasted a really fresh scup? Or must one have Cape Cod blood in his veins to appreciate scup at its true value?

In all this agreeable medley of sound advice about all manner of edible things, it seems not to have entered into Mr. Finck's mind that some human beings are not fitted to enjoy the whole of earth's bounty. There are, beyond a certain age, arteries to be considered before we indulge ourselves, as he would have us, in juicy meats or nutritious peas and beans. In bidding us to eat at least once a day a sour salad with plenty of vinegar, he does not seem fully to realize how many of us, alas! are unable to take acids so freely. The proteids and the carbohydrates, the careful proportioning of foods to digestions—such considerations as these appear to weigh lightly on Mr. Finck's gastronomic conscience.

So brimming are these pages with good nature, the hopeful American spirit, the evident wish to do good, and to make people healthier and happier, that it is an easy thing to forgive the lack of orderly precision, the violent explosions of personal feeling or belief, the frequent "journalistic" nature of the style. The faults seem small when the real good accomplished is so great.

The Century Co. is bringing out "Algebra, First Course," by Prof. W. C. Brenke and Miss Edith Long.

Another textbook on "The Teaching of Arithmetic" (American Book Company), by Alva Walker Stamper, has been added to the long list of similar works. One sometimes wonders why the teacher of arithmetic to children needs so portentous an amount of method. Apparently, a knowledge of the number concepts of the Hindus and the Egyptians is essential to these teachers. And even multiplication and division are erudite subjects and not to be trifled with, although children, in the past, could be taught them readily without such pedagogical intricacies. Elementary schoolteachers are as patient as animals on the vivisection table.

Dr. John Green Curtis, of New York city, a physiologist and joint author of the "American Textbook of Physiology," died in his summer home at Chatham, Mass., on Saturday. He was sixty-eight years old, and was a half-brother of the late George William Curtis. Graduating from Harvard in 1866 and from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in this city in 1870, Dr. Curtis became a professor in the latter institution, after having first served ten years as surgeon at Bellevue Hospital. In 1909 he was made emeritus professor of physiology.

Drama

Enthusiastic scenes were witnessed in the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-on-Avon, at the close of the last performance of the Shakespeare Festival, which was running during the whole of August. Amid much cheering, presentations were made to the artists, and congratulatory speeches followed by the chairman of the Memorial Association, Mr. Flower, and Mr. Benson, the director of the dramatic performances, on the unprecedented success of this year's celebrations. Visitors from all parts of Great Britain had attended, also 500 teachers and students for the School of Folk Song and Dance, held in connection with the festival. A remarkable month's programme included eleven of Shakespeare's plays, also modern plays by Bernard Shaw and John Masefield, Lord Lytton's "Richelieu," a series of Warwickshire and Worcestersbire village children's plays, organized by Lady Isabel Margesson; a morality play of "Job," arranged by Miss Sybil Amherst, and performed by the Norwich players; the drama of Glastonbury, presented by Bedford students; performances by Dunmow players, and a beautiful production of a Harvest Masque by Stratford townfolk. Morris dances and folk songs, organized by the English Folk Dance Society, under the direction of Mr. Cecil Sharp, and lectures on dramatic and art subjects by eminent lecturers, also figured in the programme.

"Years of Discretion," which had a long run in this city—when it had the advantage of Belasco's stage management—has been produced in London, where it has met with a somewhat cool reception from the critics. The fact is that it is weak in spots. About two-thirds of it is light comedy of an uncommonly good sort, but the remaining third is full of clumsy exaggeration. The London critics judge it by its deficiencies rather than its merits.

"Interlopers" is the title of a new comedy by H. M. Harwood, which Messrs. Vedrenne and Eadie are producing in the London Royalty Theatre. It is understood to deal with the question whether husband or children ought to be the first care of a wife, and is said to be written in a light vein.

Speaking of John Galsworthy's new play, soon to be produced in the London Court Theatre, an English theatrical writer says:

"The Fugitive," as it is named, is likely to prove the author's most serious contribution as yet to the stage. It is a drama of strong situations, and written in a frankly outspoken vein. The leading character is that of a woman, married but childless, who, breaking away from class traditions, bravely faces the world, prepared to accept whatsoever consequences may result from that step. It should perhaps be mentioned that the play has been in existence for some time, but has been held back until certain conditions of production could be assured.

John Henry Jack, better known as John Jack, who died last week in the Home for Retired Actors, at Springbrook, near Holmesburg, Pa., was, in his day, one of the best-known players on the American stage. Born in Philadelphia in 1836, he became call boy in the Walnut Street Theatre when he was sixteen years old, and gradually made his way upward, until, in the course of time, he won recognition as a thoroughly qualified performer. He furnished the first proof of his superior quality in a performance of Sir Peter Teazle, for which he was impressed in an emergency, and thereafter he was assigned chiefly to the parts of "old men," in which he soon became proficient. It was his size, doubtless, that first suggested his impersonation of Falstaff, in which he was popular for many years. Edwin Forrest was in the heyday of his success when Jack became a prominent member of his company. In the season of 1853-54 he was a member of the company at the Chestnut Street Theatre, which included Joseph Jefferson, John Gilbert, John Sleeper Clark, and Lizzie Western. Then he went to a theatre at Richmond, Va., and returned to Philadelphia to become a member of the company at the National Theatre. He was not in any respect a great actor, but he was a performer of all-round excellence. In later years he offered a notable piece of characterization in his Sir John D'Urberville in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles."

Music

HIGH MUSIC AND PLAIN AMERICANISM.

The reviewers have generally spoken of the new venture at the Century in New York as an experiment in opera in English. But its real significance, of course, is that it is not primarily an experiment in English opera, but an experiment in cheap opera. If the problem were one of language only, a solution might conceivably be approached in other ways. Thus it is not impossible that Caruso or Farrar or Fremstad could be induced, by arguments to which the artistic soul is not at all insensible, to sing in English if the patriotism of Metropolitan audiences so demanded. But because the primary purpose on Central Park West is to give opera at popular prices, a thing which can be done only with artists not of the first order, it was inevitable that the patriotic motive should be called upon to make up for the lack of first-rate talent; and properly. It is well to recognize that the success of the new opera house depends only in minor degree on whether the Century audience can follow the English libretto with greater ease than the Metropolitan audience follows the Italian, the French, or the German. The real question is whether a New York audience can be persuaded to listen to good music which labors under the disadvantage of being offered at moderate prices.

This fact was clearly in the minds of the reviewers when they set themselves to argue that, after all, the quality of opera which people will get at the Century is equal to that which is offered in most European cities. It is a brave attempt to combat the national habit which insists on having the best, or nothing at all. It is an attempt that certainly deserves to succeed. If the general choice were really one between the very best music and no music at all, it would not be so bad. But an American public rather reasons in this way: if we cannot afford to pay six dollars to hear Caruso, then we will go to hear the Alabama Choo-Choo Rag. Thus the cult of only the best becomes, for the great majority, the cult of the worst. Good second-class opera may do for the people of Munich and Budapest, but will never do for the uncrowned American sovereign; so the uncrowned sovereign goes in for the music of musical comedy. How is this essentially snobbish attitude of the great New York public to be combated? Perhaps as good a way as any is to keep on citing Munich and Budapest, until native complacency is stirred to the point of confessing that Munich and Budapest are neither of them "one-horse" towns, and that opera which is good enough for them may be worth listening to, after all. So let us hope that Munich and Budapest will continue to be flung at our reluctant public. But another good way, good because direct, is to mince no words at all about this stupid snobbery which rejects the beautiful things of life because beauty is not always to be had in its "swellest" and most expensive form.

We believe in the efficacy of hard words when it comes to assailing a bad tradition, because plain speaking will hearten the slaves of a bad tradition to rise and mutiny against their fate. Custom is often imposed on the many by the few. There must be a great many people in New York, people of simple tastes and right aspirations, who, because they cannot have the best, would be happy with the next best if they were not ashamed. They are the victims of an expensive and shoddy standard, created by the comfortably rich and supported by the eighteen-dollar-a-week clerk who thinks that "life" means two-dollar seats in the theatre for himself and his best girl. Why should it be necessary to quote the example of Munich and Budapest? Among New York city's five millions there must be Munichs and Budapests and Milans and Dresdens; large population-groups, that is, of honest provincial taste, who, if they followed their natural inclinations, would be happy with second-class opera and a second-class seat at a good play; but they are terrorized by the traditions of the great American spender. That terror, we imagine, is on the decline. The opera experiment at the Century, if it succeeds, will thus have a significance extending beyond its special field. It will be the index of a wholesome change in the general attitude of the people towards the things of life that are worth while.

Louis Koemmenich begins his second season as conductor of the New York Oratorio Society with rehearsals on September 25. The sole novelty of the season will be an oratorio, "Ruth," by Georg (not Robert) Schumann. It is set for December 5. On December 26 and 27, "The Messiah" will be sung for the 84th and 85th times by this society. On March 28 will be the society's third performance of Beethoven's Mass in D. A final concert, scheduled for April 25, will be devoted to à capella music. The programme of this has not yet been arranged. This final event will mark the 231st "regular" concert of the society. There will be twenty-seven regular rehearsals on Thursday nights and twenty-five extra, men and women separate, for Tuesday nights. The concerts will be given as usual in Carnegie Hall, which has been renovated during the summer, and the accompaniment will be by the orchestra of the New York Symphony Society.

New York music-lovers had the chance last season to hear 381 high-class concerts, besides about 300 lighter musical entertainments. Of orchestral concerts alone there were 106, of which the Philharmonic provided 44, the New York Symphony Orchestra 25, and the Boston Orchestra 10. The indications are that the present season will be equally busy, if not more so, for there will be three opera companies.

Mexico has spent $10,000,000 on an opera house in the capital city. The Government also contributes about $100,000 a year towards the support of the National Conservatory of Music in that city. Connected with it are about fifty teachers, mostly Mexicans. To specially talented pupils scholarships are awarded entitling them to a course of study in Europe. At the opera the audience imitates the Italian custom of hissing a singer who happens to emit an imperfect tone.

The Mozart Society of this city has procured Charles Wakefield Cadman for a concert to be given on December 6. On October 9 he appears in Minneapolis, with the Indian girl, Tsianina Redfeather, in his "Indian Music Talk," and a recital at which his new trio will be heard. Later on this trio will appear in Pittsburgh.

A "Syllabus of Kentucky Folk Song" has been published by Hubert G. Shearin and Josiah H. Combs. The contents are divided into song-ballads, love-songs, dance-songs, number-songs, lullabies, jigs, ditties, etc. The music of the Kentucky mountain folk is described as a survival of the British and Irish music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which was transmitted to the colonies orally. Some of the rhymes and tunes, however, are obviously taken from more recent vaudeville and "musical comedy" performances.

The report comes from London that several wealthy men are to assist Thomas Beecham in building a new theatre with a seating capacity of 4,000, in which operas will be performed in English and other languages at vaudeville prices—which are from about 12 cents to $1.25 a seat.

Edgar Stillman Kelley writes about "MacDowell's Ideal Realized" in the Musical Courier. The Peterboro, N. H., home of America's foremost composer was to him a great source of inspiration, and he keenly realized how much such environment might mean to those less fortunate. Thanks to Mrs. MacDowell's efforts, the MacDowell Memorial Association now, as Mr. Kelley remarks, > not only offers a rare retreat for the artist of acknowledged attainments in search of a quiet working place, but also affords similar oportunities to those whose careers are still in a formative stage. . . . The rustic studios are scattered throughout the forests of the large estate of four hundred acres, and those occupied by musicians are always sufficiently remote from the others to avoid any disturbance to fellow-composers. . . . The colony started six years ago with three art workers, a sculptor, a writer, and a musician. Now, even with the increased number of studios, the quarters are too cramped to accommodate fifteen, while new applicants are constantly being refused. Herein we already see the fulfilment of prophecies made by Richard Watson Gilder, Howard Mansfield, and others, who steadfastly maintained the value and practicability of a scheme which, at the outset, was held as visionary and impossible by all the world.

Art

Greek Refinements: Studies in Temperamental Architecture. By William Henry Goodyear. New Haven: The Yale University Press. $10.

It is now a matter of common knowledge that the lines of Greek temples are not absolutely straight, but consist of a series of subtle curves, hardly perceptible to the naked eye in many cases, but occurring with such regularity that, in the opinion of most modern authorities, they can only have been produced intentionally.* The discovery of these curves is, however, of comparatively recent date. It was first made by Joseph Hopper and John Pennethorne, and published by the former in 1838. Once attention was drawn to this subject, its importance was recognized, and, in 1851, appeared Penrose's famous book, entitled "An Investigation of the Principles of Athenian Architecture," in which these Greek refinements were thoroughly discussed. This book is still the standard work on the subject; and in the more recent publications on Greek architecture the results then obtained are naturally always quoted.

Professor Goodyear has long been specially interested in this important feature of Greek architecture and has devoted many years to its study. The present publication is the result of these investigations, and is to be succeeded in the near future, we understand, by another volume on refinements in mediæval architecture. As Mr. Goodyear points out, a great mass of additional material has been accumulated since the publication of Penrose's book, and a new treatment of the subject was much needed. His object has been to provide a summary of the observations of the first workers in this field, as well as of all later publications dealing with this subject. He addresses his book both to the general public and to the specialist. For the former he has tried to produce a "readable book"; for the latter he has tried to produce an "exhaustive treatment" in a "scientific spirit."

If for no other reason, Mr. Goodyear's book is valuable for its numerous illustrations, some of which are of astonishing excellence. They include one hundred and twenty subjects, among them a number of photographs of the Greek horizontal curves in the South Italian and Sicilian Greek temples, which are the only extant photographs on this subject for these temples.

Mr. Goodyear draws attention to a popular modern opinion, which he deems a fallacy, namely, that the Greek curves were intended to correct an optical illusion and to make the architectural lines look straight. According to him, this was not the reason, the curves being dictated by the Greek architects' "sentiment of beauty," in other words, not because they preferred the appearance of straight lines, and, therefore, made their lines curved, so as to appear straight, but because they preferred curved lines.

With regard to the text in general, it is undeniably suggestive and it will probably stimulate a wholesome interest in this subject. The chief fault of the book is that it falls between two stools. It is neither a popular handbook nor a strictly scientific work. In spite of the author's attempt to make it readable, it is full of technical language which is too abstract for general reading, and it abounds in discouraging sentences, such as this: "Greek refinements . . . are purposed departures from the supposedly geometrical regularity of the horizontal and perpendicular lines in the Greek temples, and from the prescribed mathematical equality of their apparently corresponding dimensions and spaces." It is, of course, a question whether so technical a subject can be made popular. In any case, Mr. Goodyear does not seem to us to have succeeded in doing so; he has only impaired the scientific value of his work by a discursive style and by a somewhat too personal tone.

*J. Durm, in his Baukunst der Griechen (1910), p. 120 ff., is still of the opinion that the horizontal curves were not intentional but were produced in most cases in the course of time.

Finance

DIRECTORS AND THEIR TRUST.

It is natural that the misfortunes of the New Haven Railroad should focus the attention of the investing public upon the question of responsibility for faulty management, whether in the direction of financing or operation, for apparently the conduct of the New Haven road has in both respects left something to be desired. Without assuming to fix the blame upon anybody in particular for the shortcomings in either respect, it is not too much to say that this company's troubles may serve to point a moral which applies in greater or less degree to most railway companies in the United States; at least in one point, and that is the position of the director.

The American theory of corporation management, so far as government of railways is concerned, is democratic enough, in that stockholders are supposed to choose directors who themselves choose executive officers to carry on the actual management of the railway. From the president down the chain of authority is explicitly expressed and the duties of the various links are clearly specified, thoroughly understood, and as a rule regularly performed. The subordinates get their orders from the president, and he, presumably, gets his orders from the board of directors, who hold the power of the stockholders in their hands. But directors are as a rule required to meet but seldom, usually not oftener than once a month, and sometimes not so often, and they are virtually unpaid for their services, unless the gold-piece given as a fee at the meeting be considered as compensation. As a rule, there is an executive committee of directors, who may meet oftener than this—but not much oftener—and who are equally uncompensated. What services are expected of men who serve either as plain directors or as members of the executive committee under such conditions?

In the nature of things their activities, as an Irishman might say, must be largely passive. They can but listen to reports and suggested plans and approve or disapprove as the spirit moves them; it is not humanly possible for them to originate. The president is looked to for initiative. He is expected to suggest policies, work up plans, prepare estimates, and so on; and when these come before the board for final action the directors must perforce act upon what is before them, for that is all the knowledge they have or can have. Meeting not oftener than once a month, not being paid for their time, save for the time actually spent in the board-room (which often is a scant hour or two), their actual exercise of power becomes a purely pro forma affair, and the officers of the road are its real governors. In short, whatever may be the theoretic function of directors, the fact is that in this country they have been and still are the merest figureheads, so far as actual direction of railways is concerned. A glance at the "Directory of Directors" will disclose a state of affairs which on the face of it is an absurdity.

And yet the law places upon directors ultimate responsibility for corporate acts, and occasionally there is a feeble murmur from an outraged stockholder that "directors should direct." But why should stockholders of any corporation assume that they can get others to work for them for nothing? Which is what they do assume under the existing order. And why do they largely choose as their directors men of large affairs, deeply engrossed in enterprises of their own, whose time may be supposed to be worth more than most people's time? It will be answered that the object is to get the benefit of their large knowledge and experience; but do we get this benefit? It is true that the services of a Harriman or a Hill are worth uncounted millions to a Union Pacific or a Great Northern, but only because those services are devoted almost exclusively to those properties. Imagine Mr. Hill a director in sixty corporations other than Great Northern, and what would his services—even his—be worth to each of those compared with the continuous services of a paid director, without Mr. Hill's ability, but with continuous attention to his trust?

Moreover, there is the ticklish question of the "banker-director." Railways always have needed, and probably always will need, a good deal of "financial" management, and finance is a matter of banking. Probably the generation of "banker-directors" in railways is passing away, as the financing problems have become easier to solve. Nevertheless, it still seems to be tacitly assumed that a railway must have a financial protector, and that he must "have representation" in the board. The question is, Whom does he "represent"? It is natural that in these days this question should be put somewhat pointedly.

If directors are to "direct" according to theory, they must be prepared to give their time freely to their trust, and if they are expected to do this, they must be compensated properly for their time, as is the custom in England. The system at present in vogue here is illogical, and consequently unsatisfactory. If directors are expected to work for nothing, it is but natural to suppose that they will find compensation in other ways, or they will not work, and in either case the interest of the stockholders is insufficiently protected. The logic of the case calls for much smaller boards of directors than at present exist, much more frequent meetings, much more active participation in the task of management, and proper compensation for the work done. Instead of a bare quorum of distracted semi-amateurs listening in bored fashion to reports that mean comparatively little to them, and waiting impatiently for the "question" to be put, there would be a compact body of semi-experts reasonably familiar with the matter in hand and able to vote intelligently and accept full responsibility for the consequences of their vote.

Certain it is that had the New Haven road been governed by such a board of directors as this it would never have spent above two hundred millions of dollars in a few years for items other than "cost of road and equipment"—whatever else might have been done.

HALLECK'S NEW ENGLISH LITERATURE

By REUBEN POST HALLECK, A.M., LL.D., Author of History of English Literature, History of American Literature, and Psychology and Psychic Culture.

$1.30

This New English Literature preserves the qualities which have caused the author's former History of English Literature to be so widely used; namely, suggestiveness, clearness, organic unity, interest, and power to awaken thought and to stimulate the student to further reading. Like the older volume, though critical, it is written with a keen appreciation of the average pupil's mind, and a sympathy that is as delightful as it is rare. In this volume new facts have been brought to light, new points of view have been adopted, and more attention is paid to recent writers. Many new and important facts concerning the Elizabethan theater and the drama of Shakespeare's time are incorporated. Such important recent writers as Meredith, Hardy, Swinburne and Kipling receive adequate treatment. An entire chapter is devoted to showing how the new literature already produced in the twentieth century reveals the thoughts and ideals of this generation. Other special features of this new book are the unusually detailed Suggested Readings that follow each chapter, suggestions and references for a literary trip to England, historical introductions to the chapters, careful treatment of the modern drama, and a new and up-to-date bibliography. The volume contains over 200 pictures, selected for their pedagogical value and their unusual character.

ANDREAS: A LEGEND OF ST. ANDREW

Edited by W. M. BASKERVILL, late Professor of the English Literature in Vanderbilt University.

Those who know this Anglo-Saxon classic will appreciate it in the attractive form in which it is now available.

The text is based directly on readings copied by Professor Richard P. Wülker of Leipzig from the original "Codex Vercellencies." This has led in several places to a wide divergence from other editors, but in preserving the all-pervading Teutonic spirit of the original, a better text is presented than any existing previously.

NEW BOOKS

CHICAGO AND THE OLD NORTHWEST, 1673-1835. By MILO M. QUAIFE, Professor of History in the Lewis Institute of Technology.

This book recounts, in a manner at once scholarly and dramatic, the early history of Chicago. From the point of view of Chicago and the Northwest alone, the work is local in character, although the locality concerned embraces five great states of the Union; in the larger sense its interest is as broad as America, for every foot of America has been at some time on the frontier of civilization.

470 pages. 8vo, cloth. $4.23 postpaid.

ANIMAL COMMUNITIES IN TEMPERATE AMERICA, AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE CHICAGO REGION. By VICTOR E. SHELFORD, Instructor in Zoology in the University of Chicago.

This volume presents the principles of field ecology illustrated by the more widely distributed animal habitats of the eastern half of temperate North America, and the aquatic habitats of a much larger territory. Six chapters deal with general principles. In several chapters the animal communities are considered from the point of view of modern dynamic ecology. A valuable feature of the book is the three hundred figures of widely distributed animals chosen to represent the chief types of animal communities and their characteristic modes of life.

ARTIFICIAL PARTHENOGENESIS AND FERTILIZATION. By JACQUES LOEB, Head of the Department of Experimental Biology, Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

This new work presents the first complete treatment of the subject of artificial parthenogenesis in English. It gives an account of the methods by which unfertilized eggs can be caused to develop by physico-chemical means, and the conclusions which can be drawn from them concerning the mechanism by which the spermatozoon induces development. Since the problem of fertilization is connected with so many problems of physiology and pathology, the bearing of the facts recorded and discussed in the book goes beyond the special problem indicated by the title.

318 pages. 12mo, cloth. $2.68 postpaid.

THE ELEMENTS OF DEBATING: A Manual for Use in High Schools and Academies. By LEVERETT S. LYON, of the Joliet High School.

This book does not pretend to originality in material; its aim is to put the well-established principles of the art within the reach of young students. It therefore presents the elements of public speaking so freed from technicality that the student may assimilate them in the shortest possible time and with the least possible interpretation by the teacher. Illustrations are given from some of the most effective arguments ever written, and a list of suggested topics is added in an appendix.

148 pages. 12mo, cloth. $1.07 postpaid.

LONDON IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By PERCY H. BOYNTON, Assistant Professor of English Literature in the University of Chicago.

This volume deals with ten consecutive periods, characterized in turn by the work and spirit of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb, Dickens, and by the qualities of Victorian and contemporary London. The temper of each epoch is discussed, and then in particular those literary works which are intimately related to certain localities in London. The work contains four maps and forty-three other illustrations, selected from the best of a great fund of material.

SOCIAL PROGRAMMES IN THE WEST. (The Barrows Lectures.) By CHARLES R. HENDERSON, Head of the Department of Practical Sociology in the University of Chicago.

The lectures delivered with so much success in the Far East are included in this volume. The subjects are as follows: "Foundations of Social Programmes in Economic Facts and in Social Ideals," "Public and Private Relief of Dependents and Abnormals," "Policy of the Western World in Relation to the Anti-Social," "Public Health, Education and Morality," "Movements to Improve the Economic and Cultural Situation of Wage-Earners," and "Providing for Progress."

212 pages. 8vo, cloth. $1.38 postpaid.

CHRISTIAN FAITH FOR MEN OF TO-DAY. By E. ALBERT COOK, Professor of Systematic Theology in the Congregational College of Canada.

This volume contains a clear and reasonable interpretation of life from the Christian point of view, and some definite formulation of those beliefs that have proved most effectual in the development of individual character and in the promotion of the welfare of society. The convenient arrangement of the material in numbered paragraphs, the valuable appendices, and the general systematic treatment of the subject commend the book as a popular text for college men and women, and for adult classes and clubs, as well as for general reading.

276 pages. 12mo, cloth. $1.35 postpaid.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1913.

The Week

The exemption feature of the income-tax section of the tariff bill emerges from the conference committee somewhat improved over the form given to it by either the House or the Senate. The House bill had made a flat exemption of $4,000. For this the Senate substituted what was often referred to as an exemption of $3,000, and in most comments on the subject credit was accordingly given the Senate for having lowered the exemption. This praise, however, was entirely unjustified, for not only did the additional exemption of $1,000 in the case of married men bring the amount back to the House figure in the great majority of cases, but there was a further exemption of $1,000 in the case of a family with two or more children, making the total exemption $5,000. This feature more than balanced the lowering of the minimum exemption to $3,000, from the point of view of the objection that the tax was levied so as to be felt by only a very small fraction of the population. As it is, a slight concession has been made to that objection. How slight the concession is may be judged from the fact that the experts estimate the number of persons who will have to pay the tax at 425,000, which is about one-fiftieth of the number of families in the United States. It is notable that the marked increase of rates at the upper end of the scale—the rate on the biggest incomes going up to 7 per cent. instead of 4—went through with almost no resistance.

In his speech at the Progressive Convention at Rochester, Col. Roosevelt gave several interesting illustrations of that superiority to trifling little distinctions, whether of fact or of law, for which he is so eminently distinguished. "I ask you," he said, referring to the Sulzer affair, "whether you prefer the recall exercised by the people themselves at the polls, or the recall exercised by Mr. Murphy at the end of the telephone." As he expressly disclaimed the purpose of referring to "any matter pending before the court of impeachment," what he here denominates "the recall exercised by Mr. Murphy" can only be the action of the Assembly in bringing Sulzer before that court. Does any recall "by the people themselves" contemplate the interposition of a trial by a court of any kind before it becomes effective? Does it give the accused a chance to state his case with the aid of counsel, to confront his accusers, to put their charges to the test of a vote by a limited number of persons who act in the full light of publicity and to whom public opinion will bring home the responsibility of an unjust decision? Unless Mr. Roosevelt means to assert that the powers of the court of impeachment now apparently trying the case of Gov. Sulzer at Albany are in reality "exercised by Mr. Murphy at the end of a telephone," his comparison between the present Constitutional process and the recall by popular vote is a sad misfit.

But an instance far more significant is the statement the Colonel made of his own particular doctrine, generally known as that of the recall of decisions. When he first proposed that scheme, its avowed purpose was to give to the people an opportunity of declaring Constitutional a law which the courts had declared unconstitutional, and of thus substituting their interpretation for that of the courts. It was at once pointed out, and especially by President Taft, that in practice the people would not vote on the question of Constitutionality, but simply on what they regarded as the merits of the law. Mr. Roosevelt has been sliding away from his original position pretty steadily; but in his Rochester statement he bids good-by to it completely. This is what he says:

> I am not advocating that the judges be coerced by public opinion in that the correctness of their decisions be directly revised by the people, but merely that the State Constitution be so amended that when the courts declare unconstitutional a statute which it would be competent for the people by amending the Constitution to authorize the Legislature to enact, the people shall at the next election have a right to decide whether or not they want such statute to become a law, and if the majority favor it then the Constitution shall be deemed amended to authorize it, and the people will have the benefit of it without waiting for years to formally amend the Constitution and reënact it and test it again in the courts.

In the words we have italicized, Mr. Roosevelt drops the Constitutional restraint overboard altogether. Whether he is unaware that he is doing it, or whether he regards the dropping of the Constitution as a matter too trifling to mention, we confess we feel quite unable to determine.

The forward-looking aspect of politics in New Jersey is emphasized by the large returns by which Gov. Fielder and ex-Gov. Stokes won the Democratic and Republican nominations. Despite the fact that both depended much on personal popularity, and the former on President Wilson's endorsement, their progressivism was clearly a main factor in the result. Acting Gov. Fielder's attitude towards labor legislation and State control of labor disputes, the adoption of newer forms of city government, and the cause of municipal ownership, represented a clear advance over that of Mr. Katzenbach. He had, moreover, a record of efficiency in helping procure for Newark the reforms he advocated. Ex-Gov. Stokes, whose nomination over three rivals was almost unanimous, represents issues that are expected to draw to him a large percentage of the Progressive vote. It is notable that the Progressives, who polled 147,000 votes in the last Presidential election, cast but a few more than 10,000 on this occasion; and that the victory of Colby over Osborne was the victory of a man who believes fusion between Republicans and Progressives "desirable and necessary" over one who holds it abhorrent from every point of view. The real contest thus promises to centre upon Fielder and Stokes.

The outcome of the Massachusetts primaries has certain large resemblances to the outcome of those in New Jersey. The old-party machines lost in their fight for a Republican nominee for Governor and a Democratic nominee for Lieutenant-Governor, and this in the face of the smallest vote in a State primary since the Direct Nominations law of 1911 went into operation. Only 80,000 Republicans and 70,000 Democrats went to the polls, although Gov. Foss received 193,000 votes and the Republican candidate 143,000 last November.

That was in a Presidential election, but, oddly enough, neither party polled as many votes then as it did in 1911, if, for purposes of comparison, we count the Progressives in with the Republicans. And yet the contests of last week were particularly sharp. The Progressive vote was small for two reasons: there was but one candidate for the nomination for Governor, and the leaders of the party had advised their followers not to go to the polls. Gardner's victory, like that of ex-Gov. Stokes in New Jersey, is likely to bring Progressive waverers back into the Republican fold. The uncertain element remains the present Governor, who continues to drop mysterious hints at an independent candidacy. With both of the old parties divided, the Republicans would have strong hopes of success, even with a Foss in the field.

For the third time Baltimore has passed a segregation ordinance. The first two were thrown out by the State courts when taken to them by protesting colored people. It now looks as if the matter would have to be adjudieated by the United States courts, for the ordinance of last Thursday was drawn in accordance with the advice of the Court of Appeals, given when it declared the second one unconstitutional. This was rather an unusual procedure, and showed clearly where the sympathies of the Court lay. In its essence the ordinance provides that no negro shall move into a block which has a majority of white residents, and no white person shall buy or rent in a block if the majority of residents are black. It remains to be seen whether the Supreme Court of the United States will find such a restriction consistent with the guarantees of the Federal Constitution. Eccnomically, this legislation puts iron bands on the real-estate development of Baltimore, and will, we believe, prove irksome to whites and blacks alike. It is absurd in this day and generation to return to the ghetto of the middle ages, abandoned by Europe long ago, and it cannot now be tolerated in a community which calls itself democratic.

Secretary Garrison took the only possible action in the matter of the eighteen West Point cadets who appealed to him over the heads of the Military Academy authorities to rescind their punishments for mild forms of hazing. Mr. Garrison promptly sustained Col. Townsley, the superintendent, and administered an additional punishment by girding at these cadets for their failure to take their punishment manfully. Had the Secretary decided on any other action, the discipline of the Academy would have suffered grievously; no institution of this kind could eontinue to do its work efficiently, if, whenever cadets were punished, they could, by letters to their families and their Congressmen, bring about the upsetting of the verdicts against them. A few years ago such an incident as this would not have happened. Unfortunately, Congress and President Taft set a bad example last winter by permitting the retrial and reinstatement of four cadets dismissed for having liquor in their possession. These cadets made a long political fight for reinstatement, finally inducing Mr. Taft to reverse the position of the War Department, which from the first had sustained the West Point authorities and refused to reopen the cases. Naturally, the reinstatement of these cadets after a second trial—the outcome of which was foreordained when Congress acted—has had a bad effect on the corps of eadets.

Fate thought to conceal him by naming him Pindell and making him an editor at Peoria, but President Wilson was not to be deeeived and sought him out as the fittest man to represent the United States in St. Petersburg. The only delay in naming this Ambassador is caused by the necessity of inquiring whether he will be persona grata to the Russian Government. But it ought not to take long to determine this. Why should the Czar hesitate? The American press does not think any too well of him as it is, and if he were to intimate that he should not be absolutely delighted to take a country editor to his bosom, he would hear things from our newspapers that would make his ears tingle. Not much is known about Mr. Pindell except that he had something to do with swinging the Illinois delegation at Baltimore to Wilson, but we are bound to affirm that he has speeial competence, being an editor. Any man who challenges this ought in fairness to read a file of Mr. Pindell's newspaper for the past two or three years, and we rather fancy that the objector would yield the point long before he had finished. There are, to be sure, several important diplomatie questions pending with Russia. The abrogated treaty is to be replaced by another, and matters of immigration and trade, with the rights of American citizens travelling in Russia, are to be discussed. But who will be so un-American, so distrustful of democracy, as to doubt that Pindell of Peoria in Petersburg will be found level with all these high affairs of statesmanship?

Outrageous behavior of the "gallery" on the golf links is not, as one newspaper asserts, unknown in England. At the amateur championship last year, when Mr. Abe Mitchell was in the finals with John Ball, the friends of the former dominated the crowd and showed the most violent partisanship. Even they, however, would scarcely have been capable of loudly cheering at a player's misfortune in overrunning into a trap and so losing a hard-fought match. Yet this was done at Brookline last week when Travers lost to Ouimet. The club officials were naturally much mortified and publiely apologized to Travers for the discourtesy. Where the trouble arises is, no doubt, in the fact that miscellaneous throngs now go to see matches at golf of whom great numbers are ignorant of elementary sportsmanship and particularly of the fundamental etiquette of golf. They think of it merely as a spectacle where every spectator may yell delightedly at the error of a player as freely as when a grounder is fumbled or a fly muffed in a world series in professional baseball. It is probable, too, that the partisan temper of the crowd at golf matches is intensified by its habit of betting on the contest. Whatever the explanation, the thing ought to be reformed altogether. Mistimed applause at a golf game is a worse offence than at a Wagner opera. Those who know nothing of the courtesies and proprieties of golf should be kept off the links, or not admitted until after a course of lessons how to behave there.

There is not the novelty in Princeton's announcement regarding a distinetion to be made hereafter between the mere "pass" man and the "honor" man that there was in her adoption of the preceptorial system. Harvard, for instance, has long encouraged the ambitious student by setting him free, under proper conditions, to work at a task without the requirements of attendance upon lectures, and so on, which are imposed upon the rank and file. Yet the oldest of American universities is still in doubt how to give the man of scholastic attainments something of the recognition which, without any faculty resolutions, descends upon the head of the athletic conqueror. This does not detract from the importance of the step that President Hibben and his associates have taken. The thing that our institutions of learning need is not some device for turning the cheers of the student body in the direction of their more scholarly representatives, but such emphasis, however quiet, upon the intellectual life, as will wake into activity whatever dormant interest of the kind may exist in the undergraduate's breast. This the system of "final special honors" is well devised to do.

"Historic passage" is none too strong a phrase for the trip of the first vessel through Gatun Lock into Gatun Lake. His countrymen will share, though in a less personal way, the satisfaction of Col. Goethals at the achievement. It is not simply that the dream of other ages and other engineers than our own is now at last so near fulfilment. The undertaking has been so stupendous that we could not be quite sure that it would actually be accomplished on anything like schedule time. Would not an unforeseeable accident, such as a landslide or an earthquake, happen at the final minute to spoil everything and show the impossibility of our generation, at least, driving the plough across the right little, tight little isthmus? Our reputation for doing what we set out to do was at stake. This feeling might not have been dissipated altogether by the successful journey of an excursion steamship through the lock; but when an every-day, prosaic tugboat does it, then, indeed, our doubts vanish.

The primary aim of the Administration in Mexican affairs has been the establishment of peace and constitutional government through the retirement of the central cause of dissension, Gen. Huerta. It is therefore with reason that a feeling of gratification is reported over the nomination of Gamboa by the Catholic party. In Mexico City, as in Washington, his candidacy and the drawing closer of issues between himself and Diaz are regarded as a virtual guarantee of the very things which Huerta so recently refused to pledge. This tacit yielding to our demand that the Provisional President should make no attempt to succeed himself, or to mar the impartiality of the election, is a victory marred only by the stubborn attitude of the revolutionists. As for their announced determination not to participate in the coming election, it can only be hoped that the pressure of events and the State Department will bring them also to a common-sense attitude. President Wilson has already intimated that a constitutionally elected candidate will be supported, whether malcontents choose to participate in the election or not. This intimation should have weight with all who really deserve the name "Constitutionalists"; and if a free and fair election actually occurs, and is followed by American recognition, the end of smouldering insurrection may be in sight.

The proposed dispatch of an English fleet of some twenty big ships, including eight first-class battleships, for a two months' cruise in the Mediterranean was probably not determined by the receipt of an autograph letter from the German Emperor promising not to raid Great Britain while the fleet is away. Even those opponents of Mr. Asquith who regard a German surprise as a certainty do not expect it to come off for another year or two. The reason for sending a fleet to the Mediterranean is that recent events have brought about notable political changes on the shores of that inland sea, in spite of which it is to Great Britain's interest to demonstrate that her own position of primacy remains what it was. Italy has established herself on the north coast of Africa, and still holds possession of a number of Levantine islands captured from the Turks. Greece, because of her recent victories, is planning naval expansion. The Bulgarians have reached the shores of the Ægean and may be cherishing dreams of their own. To all these aspiring nations the British Government now gives notice that, so far as control in the Mediterranean is concerned, things are to be as they have been.

The witches' caldron in the Balkans is simmering again. What unholy brew will be the final product, no one, keeping in mind the history of the Balkan Peninsula this last year, will be bold enough to predict. War between Servia and the new Albania, war between Greece and the Albanians, war between Greece and Turkey over Cavalla in Thrace, war between Turkey and Bulgaria as allies against Servia and Greece—nothing is impossible. After seeing Turkey reënter Adrianople and Kirk-Kilisseh, who shall say that it is altogether impossible to think of Turkey reëntering Salonica and Janina? The thing is conceivable. Vengeance against her late allies is the one passion that now possesses Bulgaria, and an alliance to that end with Turkey is not only conceivable, but is regarded in some quarters as having been already concluded. For herself, Monastir and Macedonia; for Turkey, whatever she can reconquer from the Greeks—that is the way Bulgaria might easily envisage the problem. If the Turks have indeed refused to enter into alliance with Bulgaria, it will have been only because they recognize that the present distracted condition of the Balkan peninsula redounds more to their advantage than the rebuilding of a powerful Bulgaria right at the doors of Adrianople.

After a long and painful illness the five-Power loan agreement in China has gone the way of all flesh. The end was foreseen from the moment when President Wilson withdrew from the arrangement and the six-Power loan became a five-Power loan. The patient died from pernicious anæmia and atrophy of the sympathetic system. Designed ostensibly as a method for setting the Chinese Republic well on the way towards economic regeneration, and to relieve the country at the same time from the fear of foreign intimidation, the agreement among the Powers soon evealed itself as subserving neither purpose. As against China, the manipulators of the scheme brought forward demands which called for the sacrifice by the Chinese of important sovereign rights. Among themselves, the Powers continued the old game of selfish intrigue. Fortunately, this was a situation by which the Chinese Government was able to profit. The struggle of political interests will undoubtedly go on, but under no guise of philanthropy.

MURPHY AS PODESTA.

It is not an inapt comparison which the London Times has just applied to a Tammany boss. It likens him to the podestà of an Italian mediæval city. And here comes our ex-podestà, Richard Croker, to lend force to the analogy. As Lodovico Sforza fled to Germany, from the city which he had betrayed and looted, Croker left us for Ireland. But he chooses the occasion of the honor done by New York to Mayor Gaynor to send back comments on the city's government which are filled with the fine old Tammany spirit. And this spirit is wonderfully like that of the typical Italian podestà. If any one doubts it, let him turn to Sismondi's chapter xx, in which he discusses philosophically the causes of the loss of liberty in the Lombard republics, and their falling, one after the other, under the sway of a podestà.

This Italian antetype of the Tammany boss was not elevated to his bad eminence by personal merit. He might often be a man fit to be denounced, as Guicciardini denounces Sforza, for absolute viltà. Of unbridled greed when things were going well for him, he would display the utmost pusillanimity in adversity or defeat. Power he attained out of the misfortunes or necessities of his fellow-citizens. Sismondi cites the example of Martin della Torre in Milan. The city had fallen on evil days. Social order was relaxed and civic authority enfeebled. There was no sure guarantee of life or property. In troublous times like those a podestà was certain to press to the front, and Della Torre found his opportunity. His qualifications for rule were of the slightest, just as his character was of the most contemptible, but he succeeded in imposing himself on Milan because, in Sismondi's words, he had "l'art de se rendre nécessaire."

Now, this is what Tammany bosses undertake to do. They seek to make themselves necessary. From Tweed to Murphy, through Kelly and Croker, they assert that they are, if not the indispensable men, at least the necessary men. Without them the city cannot be governed. This is what they always imply, and frequently they are foolish enough to affirm it publicly. Croker does this in his impudent remarks about Mayor Gaynor. Gaynor was not a good Tammany man, and therefore he could not have given New York a satisfactory government. That is elementary in the Crokerian logic. All reformers make a mess of it when they get a chance to administer the affairs of New York. Expenses and taxes go up, vice and crime increase, the citizens are growingly discontented. That is the burden of ex-Boss Croker's contention, and one sees how perfectly he expresses the sense of the class to which he belongs, and which feels that it has a proprietary interest, almost a vested right, in ruling New York. An Italian podestà, if brought back to earth, would think and talk in just that way.

And Murphy's intellectual operations are exactly of the same sort. There is a mediæval directness about them. Here is a great city. The instinctive exclamation at sight of it is, "Was für Plunder!" There is a vast amount of municipal business to be done, money to be laid out, contracts to be let. We know what the attitude of an Italian podestà would be, in the presence of all these opportunities, and Murphy's is not far different. This mighty city budget, all for me to expend! All these offices for me and my organization to fill! And in return what does the Tammany podestà offer New York? Why, very much what was offered Milan by Della Torre. A fair degree of security for life and business. A police that will at least put down riots. In addition, favors to friends and to "good" merchants and corporations, with the constant preaching that New York is the finest city in the world, where no improvements are really needed, and where it is simply preposterous to talk about the crying demand for moral and social reforms.

If Murphy thus acts like a podestà, the blame is not all to be placed upon him alone. He, indeed, endeavors to make himself and his kind "nécessaire" to New York. But what of those men in the community who allow him and his sort of government to be necessary to them—who find, not merely satisfaction, but profit in it? There's the rub in all this Tammany warfare. We should see no podestà in New York if the city were not submissive to him. It was only the desire of many belonging to the wealthy classes in the Italian republics that they should be governed by despotic rulers that made the Italian podestà possible. Shall that be repeated in New York? If so, a future Sismondi will have no difficulty in tracing the causes of our subjugation.

THE UNIONS AND THE WATERTOWN ARSENAL.

In reply to the latest labor-union attacks, Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, has again come out strongly in defence of the Taylor efficiency system, established at the Watertown, Mass., Arsenal. This is only what was to be expected. He is fortunate in being an army officer, and not dependent upon votes for the retention of high office; this leaves him free to speak the truth as he sees it, without fear of what may happen at the polls upon any given day. We are inclined to believe from his record that even if he were a Representative he would still have the courage to oppose the labor unions when he felt them to be in the wrong. If that is, however, in the realm of speculation, it is no guess that Gen. Crozier's advocacy of the Watertown efficiency system would in itself establish a prima-facie case for it, such is his reputation for clear thinking and for high professional achievements. He has, moreover, followed the development of the Taylor efficiency ideas at Watertown from the very beginning, treating them exhaustively in his annual reports in 1911 and 1912; and in the memorandum he has just submitted to the Secretary of War he is emphatically in favor of continuing the system which he has conclusively proved to have resulted not only in great savings to the Government, but also in marked benefits to the workmen.

Why is it, then, that the attacks upon it continue, and that a petition signed by 322 Watertown employees, asking for its abolition there, has been sent to the Secretary of War? It is because the unions have from the first been opposed to the Taylor system, whether introduced into private or public business. Every modern efficiency plan strikes at several of the most archaic and economically indefensible labor-union policies—the limitation of output, the standardizing of labor according to the speed of the weakest man, and the effort to uplift labor by regulating the number of workmen admitted to a given industry. Beyond doubt some of the opposition is due to a genuine misconception of what is aimed at, to a real fear that the whole scheme is to force workers to produce more than they should humanely be asked to accomplish, to "speed them up" and introduce the evils of the sweat-shop under the guise of a scientific application of their time and strength. It is needless to say that if this were the case, not only the labor unions but the conscience of the country would be aroused to protest. Instead of finding the most progressive employers, those particularly interested in their workmen, taking it up with the firm belief that they are benefiting their men quite as much as themselves, we should find them solidly arrayed against it.

Moreover, economic and industrial inefficiency helps no one, workmen or capitalists, and hurts the nation. A wasting of the physical strength of the laborers through overspeeding, such as the labor-union leaders charge against the Taylor system, would be nothing less than criminal. But we do not believe that any fear of this kind is the real reason for most of the unions' opposition. In our judgment that is due to the fact that, while the laborer profits much by the premium system, the leaders fear a loss of their power and their control of their men. At Watertown the experiment has now been going on for four years under army officers who would be the last to tarnish their good name by earning the epithet of "slave-driver," and are actuated by no desire for profits; the result is that, with the same eight-hour day as before, many of the workmen employed there are earning premiums (in addition to their previously earned wages) averaging 20 per cent. of their regular wages and running as high as 35.38 per cent., while the Government profits by an enlarged output of 60 per cent. That is, despite the labor-union contentions, there has been no decrease of wages, but a steady increase, and, of course, no change whatever in working conditions or hours.

In his report for 1912, Gen. Crozier estimated the savings in his department due to the Taylor system at $240,461.93, in addition to a saving of $122,789.61 from a more scientific use of surplus stock. This is the more extraordinary because even at Watertown the system is far from being universal. Thus, in the foundry there only 67 per cent. of the working time of the employees was given to jobs upon which premiums could be earned. In the month of May the average premium of all the premium-earning force was but $8.96, which went to 210 men out of about 600. These bonuses, our readers must remember, are not solely due to faster work under stimulus of extra pay, but result largely from the careful planning done in advance by men specially assigned to this task, whose chief duty is to free the laborer from every hindrance due to delay in getting material, or tools, or instructions, and to teach him to apply his strength most effectively. And it is against this enlightened system, with its increased wages, that 322 laborers have protested.

The explanation of these signatures can only be labor-union dictation; of that Gen. Crozier, after investigation, is convinced; and he believes that the leaders have promised that if the workmen lose this extra pay by the abolition of the system, they will use their political power to get Congress to raise their regular wages correspondingly. Here we have the sinister feature of the whole situation—that aspect of it which makes this Watertown issue of vital moment to the whole country, and far transcends the question whether the Taylor system does or does not help the workman. Shall the labor unions control the policy of the Government? Shall they dictate what manufacturing system it shall or shall not employ? Shall they, without just reason, compel the Government to conduct its arsenals wastefully and deprive the taxpayers of approximately half a million dollars a year, for nothing? There can be no doubt how these questions will be answered if the War Department is allowed to settle them for itself. It is the Congressmen, with their fear of labor-union votes, who must be watched lest they interfere, for political reasons, contrary to sound economic policy and common-sense. Hence there is much force in Gen. Crozier's proposal that the whole question be referred to the new Commission on Industrial Relations for investigation. At least it is clear that he fears no unbiassed scientific inquiry. True, a committee of Congress has already investigated the Watertown situation; its verdict was the negative one that Congress should not legislate about it. Some more positive affirmance of the Government's position is needed.

THE ULSTER CRISIS.

At Belfast there has been set up the framework of a provisional government to take over the administration of the affairs of Ulster when Home Rule becomes a fact and an Irish Parliament is installed at Dublin. The party of Protestant domination under the leadership of Sir Edward Carson has thus entered upon the constructive phase of its programme. The army that is to resist the forcible imposition of Home Rule has been in the process of organization for more than a year. A quarter of a million men signed the recent Covenant against Home Rule. The London Times, not an impartial observer to be sure, places the strength of the Ulster Volunteer Force at not less than one-half the number of signatures. Military drill has been going on, and within the last few weeks special attention has been devoted to the development of the signalling and dispatch-riding corps against the moment when the minute-men of Ulster shall be summoned to arms.

The situation throws into high relief the peculiar qualities which distinguish English political development and the spirit of English government from those of every other nation. In what other country could a movement like the Ulster uprising go on, even for a short time, without producing either panic or repression, or both? Sir Edward Carson is really threatening sedition and civil war. That he does so in the name of the higher imperial interests of Great Britain, and in terms of respectful consideration for the dignity of the Crown, does not obviate the fact that if the Home Rule bill receives the approval of King George, the Ulster Unionist leader is prepared to take the field in armed rebellion against his sovereign. One may imagine what the effect would be in France if a certain section of the population were to announce its determination to resist the sovereign will by force of arms. The cry for a man on horseback to save the country would be raised at once, and republican institutions would be shaken to their foundations. In England the crisis is severe enough; but already the feverish condition of the patient has begun to evolve an antidote. The spirit of compromise is in the air. From the Liberal side has come the proposal of a conference on Home Rule brought forward by Lord Loreburn. On behalf of the Unionists there is a willingness to talk business. The Times has declared that the Unionist party must make concessions; the time for unalterable opposition to self-government for Ireland has passed. And the other day, at Belfast, Sir Edward Carson admitted that if Home Rule fails, the south of Ireland will rise, even as Ulster threatens to do if Home Rule is forced upon her. "Great Britain must be accepted as the arbiter between the two parties," said Sir Edward. Here seems to be a plain offer to listen to reason.

What form can compromise assume? Among the Unionists in England there was till very recently a fairly general demand that the Government should submit the question of Home Rule to the country, either by way of referendum or by a dissolution of Parliament and a general election. But that solution is no longer feasible. Should the Government be defeated the extremists among the Unionists would argue that Home Rule must be thrown overboard; whereas the most responsible leaders of Unionist opinion now hold that Home Rule in some form must. come. But furthermore, Sir Edward Carson has said in so many words that if the electorate should declare in favor of Home Rule it would not affect the stand Ulster has taken. For here apparently is a situation where God and one make a majority. One of the most tenacious forces in European history is now engaged in a struggle for survival—the Protestant ascendency in Ireland. There are not many causes whose roots still reach down so firmly into the past. There are not many population groups to whom the years 1641 and 1689 are so vividly near as to the Presbyterians of Ulster. It does not necessarily follow that Protestant rule in Ireland must endure because it has so long endured. Within the last three years England has witnessed, in the Parliament Act, the overthrow of a Constitution that went back earlier than modern England. It may be that the Government which had courage enough to tame the House of Lords will be bold enough to venture on the taming of Ulster. But it will not do so without very serious consideration.

In favor of a firm stand by the Government is the fact that Home Rule has been indirectly pronounced upon by the voters of the nation. In the elections that were fought upon the Parliament Bill it was quite generally understood, and virtually admitted on the Unionist side, that the shackling of the House of Lords was but a prelude to Home Rule. In favor of the Government is the fact that the justice of Ireland's claims has by this time imposed itself upon the conscience of the nation. Ulster admits this when it demands, no longer the maintenance of the Protestant ascendency, but the separation of Ulster from Catholic Ireland for the protection of the Protestant minority. In favor of the Government is the fact that even in Ulster the Protestant element does not overwhelmingly outnumber the Catholic population. The representation of Ulster in the House of Commons is evenly divided between Unionists and Nationalists, or shows possibly a majority of one for the latter. Thus when the Protestants of Ulster protest against being placed in the hands of a Catholic Parliament at Dublin, the question still remains, what guarantees there will be for the Catholic population of Ulster if that province is to be set apart from the rest of Ireland with a local government of its own. For the moment, however, the political vane points to compromise.

FRESHMEN AND LIFE.

This is the freshman's hour. Day by day during the past week entering classes have been asked by presidents and deans to consider why they have come to college and to remember that student days are but preparation for afterlife. Books for their special benefit also come out at this season. One by a professor mindful of a first year at college wasted lies at hand. It contains the usual admonition to young men to bear in mind that life is earnest, to maintain steadfastness of purpose, and to cling to the ideals of one's childhood. With its exalted purpose no one will quarrel. In America as elsewhere the number of freshmen who idle, or fall into grievous follies, through lack of timely warning, is large; and only by serious, straightforward talk can they be raised to their better selves.

Yet it is a question whether such advice does not misplace the emphasis. Neither in the comments just cited nor in the various addresses of college presidents which the book includes, are the possibilities of the essential freedom of collegiate existence sufficiently stressed. This freedom is what undoubtedly most impresses the freshman, be he by nature a loafer or serious minded; for the moment it is the central fact of his life. Issuing from the discipline of home or boarding-school, he finds himself in an atmosphere in which he seems to be master of his destiny. The resultant zest might wisely be taken by educators as a starting-point. In a negative sense it is so taken. That is, men are cautioned not to fancy that this is really freedom, and with such a lead it is easy to point out that no moments of life are detached from the thread of our being, that what we do to-day helps to shape our attitude years hence. Now, not all freshmen are weak, by any means; yet appeal is not made to the imagination of the strong as it should be. To them the hearty if raucous tone of a famous professor, now dead, would have a welcome sound. He used to urge certain young gentlemen to have experience. "It will cost you dear, but have it." The goodness of his own life forbade one to read into his words permission to do unworthy acts. Out of the strong cometh forth sweetness. If colleges are to maintain their distinction, the note must be struck by exceptional men, and the great opportunities of these should not be slighted by preoccupation with saving the unfit from hardships. Democracy in education need lead to no such extreme.

The democratic spirit has given to the accepted phrase "preparation for life" a meaning too strict. It is not necessary that all freshmen should be made to see the precise connection between college and the world at large. Colleges by splendid traditions have amply justified themselves, and the important point for entering students to understand is the opportunity for intellectual expansion which lies before them. The magic of pure speculation is something which even a boy, if rightly handled, can distinctly feel. From signifying preparation for life in a very general way, the college has too often, in the minds of educators, come to mean life itself, in the conventional sense. This it legitimately is not. What have the problems of pure mathematics to do with "real life"? Yet it would be a pity if mathematicians, sensitive over the clamorings of efficiency sharpers, should entirely forego their labors on infinity for nearer examples drawn from our everlasting shops and factories.

In some way the freshman must be made to think of college not only as a preparation for life, but also as being much detached from life. Properly used, college should be analogous to a journey to Europe taken for the purpose of better understanding America. Conditions in the two spheres greatly differ, but neither distorts eternal values. The point could be the more easily enforced because of the attitude in which even the freshman ordinarily presents himself. Emancipated for the moment he really is, as he imagines, and in a sense is free to shape the world unto his desire. The trust which at the outset many a boy places in the efficacy of thought as taught by his masters is pathetic when contrasted with the little that is done to foster it. In this country this disillusioning comes much sooner than in Europe. Take men fresh from Oxford. Almost invariably they show great self-assurance in applying their book-learning to life. Amusing they may appear to hardened worldlings, yet they testify to a wholesome state of instruction. From reading the accepted authorities and from discussing these as though they were still matters of live importance, they emerge with the "jump," as they suppose, on their less educated fellows. And it is indeed significant that Oxford, which in so many ways stands aloof from the world of the immediate present, yet contrives to prepare her sons almost at once to undertake pressing duties of the realm. Oxford men pride themselves upon having dwelt while at college in regions somewhat magical. It would be well if this magical element in college education were not neglected by presidents and deans at opening time. This it is, we fancy, which a rightminded freshman vaguely feels, and calls freedom; the pity is that too often he is not encouraged to convert his yearnings into a freedom of the noblest sort.

A DISTRESSING MIX-UP.

The Nation refuses to be a party any longer to a conspiracy of silence. A crime of extraordinary daring and startling moral turpitude has been perpetrated in this city, and it is time that the police should take cognizance of the affair. We refer, of course, to the kidnapping of the editor of Harper's Weekly. One dark night, within the last two months, Mr. Norman Hapgood was on his way home from the McClure building, on Twentieth Street, when a taxicab from which the registration number had been removed ran up close to the sidewalk. Four men leaped out from the cab, threw a sack over Mr. Hapgood's head, and hustled him into the cab, which set off at high speed in the direction of Brooklyn. Since that time, Harper's Weekly, though still bearing the name of Norman Hapgood as editor, has in reality been edited by his brother, Mr. Hutchins Hapgood, who is well known in the neighborhood as an exponent of philosophical anarchism and as an admirer of the propaganda of Miss Emma Goldman. This will explain the nature of much of the writing that has been appearing in Harper's Weekly under the initials "N. H." At first we were inclined to believe that this was simply a printer's error for "H. H." But a careful examination of several numbers of the journal once edited by George William Curtis has convinced us that it cannot be a succession of printer's errors that we are confronted with.

Nothing more characteristic has emanated from the pen of Mr. Hutchins Hapgood than the featured article entitled "Two Kinds of Mothers," which he contributes to last week's issue of Harper's under the initials "N. H." The article is by way of commentary on a double-page cartoon appearing in the same issue and bearing the same title, "Two Kinds of Mothers." The picture shows on one page a mother of the tenements nursing her baby, and on the other page a young woman in an extremely tight and generously slitted gown drinking champagne in a cabinet particulier in the company of a gentleman who might be a racetrack gambler or a prosperous gunman, or both. Gazing upon this picture and then on that, Mr. Hutchins Hapgood has draped the mantle of inspiration about him and written as follows:

> The ideal of motherhood is not to be lessened, but it must be supplemented. It must accommodate itself to the enlarged development of woman's mind and opportunities. That woman of Mr. Becker's in the private dining-room is a ridiculous-looking object, rather discouraging because she is trying only for personal power, and personal power through the use of charm only. She seeks excitement instead of service; and yet is there not a useful striving in the background? Perhaps not in the case of this particular individual, because, judging from the wolfish face of the man she is with, it is a very low aspect of pleasure that we have to deal with.

Then come some plain truths about those fiends incarnate, "our Puritan ancestors," supplemented by a statement of the self-evident fact that "emancipation from middle-class standards of taste, morality, and intellect is, so far as it goes, a good thing."

Fortunately, reason tells us that the usurpation of power in the office of Harper's cannot continue much longer. When the police have rescued Mr. Norman Hapgood from his place of confinement in the neighborhood of Bay Ridge and reinstated him in his lawful place in the McClure building, the restored editor will, of course, have a heart-to-heart talk with his brother. He will not reproach him for the act of assault and impersonation which, after all, was a bit of direct action and sabotage carried out with all sincerity in behalf of a cause close to the heart of the perpetrator. Neither will Mr. Norman Hapgood reproach his brother too severely for casting overboard our middle-class standards of taste and morality; he will content himself with pointing out that the tenement-house mother in the picture would seem to indicate that feeding one's babies is a virtue which is shared by the lower classes with the middle classes. But the evicted and restored editor of Harper's will take serious objection to his brother's repudiation of the intellect along with morality and taste. Possibly, we can live a while without morality and without taste; but if we abnegate the use of mind, how shall we be different from the beasts? And, specifically, without the use of intellect, how can one write magazine articles in favor of a new standard of taste and of morality?

JANE AUSTEN.

I.

It is peculiarly fitting that the story of Jane Austen's life should remain a kind of family heritage. The first biographical sketch was prepared by her brother Henry for the edition of "Northanger Abbey" and "Persuasion" published in 1818, the year after her death. The first full "Memoir" was written by J. E. Austen Leigh, the son of her brother James, and issued in 1870. Her "Letters" were given to the world, in 1884, by another nephew, Lord Brabourne; and now we have a new "Life and Letters"* compiled by the son and the grandson of the author of the "Memoir," and based largely on the two preceding works.

The story, however told, is not one of abounding interest; the letters, though characteristic of the writer and lightened now and then by flashes of her wit and satire, are too thoroughly domestic and reticent to afford of themselves much entertainment. We may admit that, and yet find the record precious in a way as offering the material of experience out of which the novelist wrought her inimitable pictures of society. Hers was a life singularly calm and protected. Her father, the Rev. George Austen, himself largely connected with substantial families of Kent and Hampshire and Lincolnshire, married a Cassandra Leigh, whose connections were wider and more distinguished than his own. In 1764 he became Rector of Steventon, "a small village tucked away among the Hampshire Downs," where his eight children were born, among them Jane, in 1775, the youngest but one. The rectory stood, we are told by the author of the "Memoir," "in a shallow valley, surrounded by sloping meadows, well sprinkled with elm-trees, at the end of a small village of cottages, each well provided with a garden, scattered about prettily on either side of the road.

. . . North of the house, the road from Deane to Popham Lane ran at a sufficient distance from the front to allow a carriage drive, through turf and trees. On the south side, the ground rose gently and was occupied by one of those old-fashioned gardens in which vegetables and flowers are combined, flanked and protected on the east by one of the thatched mud walls common in that country, and overshadowed by fine elms. Along the upper or southern side of the garden ran a terrace of the finest turf, which must have been in the writer's thoughts when she described Catherine Morland's childish delight in 'rolling down the green slope at the back of the house.'"—Who that has travelled in England has not seen such homes of peace, speaking to him of another age now almost mythical, and causing him to say in his heart, O fortunatos nimium?

The first break came in 1801, when for reasons unexplained, though the father's declining health may have been one of these, the family migrated to Bath. The resolution to move seems to have been made suddenly, and there is a tradition that the news was abruptly imparted to Jane and a friend on their return from a visit, by Mrs. Austen with the words, "Well, girls, it is all settled; we have decided to leave Steventon in such a week, and go to Bath"—whereupon Jane properly fainted away. On the death of the father, in 1805, the mother and daughters, now in straitened circumstances and partly dependent on the sons for support, left Bath, and, after some changes, settled at Chawton in Hampshire, in a cottage owned by Edward, who had been adopted into a wealthy family of Knights. Here Jane continued her quiet, loyal, busy life until her health failed, and, for medical attendance, she was carried to Winchester, from where she never returned—where she still lies, at rest in the nave of the great cathedral.

Her life was not without contacts with the greater world. Warren Hastings was bound to the family by intimate association, and when the Rev. George Austen took his bride from Bath to Steventon, they carried with them as a charge the six-year-old child of the Indian magnate. Of the sons of the family, some made distinguished places for themselves. One was for a time scholar and fellow of St. John's, Oxford; two became admirals in the navy, and another married the Comtesse de Feuillide, whose former husband had suffered death in Paris by the guillotine. But the echoes of this larger life as they come to us in Jane's letters are curiously toned down to the proprieties of a drawing-room in a country parsonage. We hear indeed of battles and adventures by sea, but she was chiefly impressed by the fact that sailors make doting husbands, and her real opinion of the profession is given in the closing words of "Persuasion," that it "is, if possible, more distinguished in its domestic virtues than in its national importance." The real material of her correspondence is afforded by the little domestic details of life, the receiving and giving of visits, private theatricals, and the conquests and defeats of a county ball at which the writer reports her own "profligate" behavior.

And her fiction comes from the same immaculate seclusion. Of personal connection with contemporary writers there is not a hint, nor is there in her books a trace of the literary ferment of the age. In the years 1797 and 8, while the Wordsworths and Coleridge were talking of high matters in the Quantocks and preparing the "Lyrical Ballads," Jane Austen was shamefastly making the first draft of "Pride and Prejudice," "Sense and Sensibility," and "Northanger Abbey," scribbling her sheets in the common "dressing-room," as they called the upstairs sitting-room at Steventon, and hiding them under her sewing from profane eyes. The years from 1811 to 1818, when her six novels were published, saw also the appearance of Shelley's "Queen Mab," Byron's "Childe Harold," Scott's "Waverley," Hunt's "Story of Rimini," and Keats's "Poems," and the difference in spirit between her novels and these works is the difference between two centuries. They are severed by the Revolution. In the great world all was turmoil. Statesmen, like Fox, were profligate in a way that needs no quotation marks about the word, armies were marching and fighting, kingdoms were remaking, the very bases of society were shaken—and in "Emma" and "Mansfield Park" we are transported into a world that seems to have been the same from everlasting to everlasting, into a kind of ideal centre of calm which was conceived, and for a time and in certain places actually realized, by the eighteenth century.

That is the point. This world in which Miss Austen's people move, concealed from the outer fray, like the heroes of Homer, in a circle of celestial mist, is no chance occurrence and no idle fancy of an inexperienced girl. Every one knows the generous and discriminating praise which Walter Scott set down in his diary, under date of March 14, 1826: "Read again, for the third time at least, Miss Austen's finely written novel of 'Pride and Prejudice.' That young lady has a talent for describing the involvements and feelings and characters of ordinary life, which is to me the most wonderful I ever met with. The big Bow-Wow strain I can do myself like any now going; but the exquisite touch which renders ordinary commonplace things and characters interesting from the truth of the description and the sentiment is denied to me." This exquisite power of feeling and analysis is no doubt the secret of the novelist's immediate charm—yet scarcely a secret, for no one can read a page of "Pride and Prejudice" without understanding the spell that is upon him—but there is also beneath this charm an evocation, an atmosphere, a meaning, a subtle interpretation of life, let us say boldly, at once ideal and real. She was not an historical novelist, like Scott, able to evoke some fragment of the past and throw around it the glamour of actuality. But she was historical in so far as the peculiarity of her surroundings and to a certain extent also of her genius enabled her to see, with a certain unconscious purity of vision, into the very heart of the society about her and to embody that society in undying characters, when the reality was beginning to pass away.

II.

It may seem pedantic, but for my part I cannot lay down one of her novels without reflecting a little on the philosophy which had come to permeate the life of the day like an all-embracing atmosphere and which was taken into the minds of the least metaphysical as naturally as the air into their bodies. Years before Jane Austen was born Bolingbroke had borrowed the guiding idea from Leibnitz and expressed it as an aphorism: "The seeming imperfection of the parts is necessary to the real perfection of the whole." The theory was in no wise new. Dr. Johnson, on what authority I have not stopped to inquire, derived it from the Arabian philosophers; it had furnished St. Thomas Aquinas ("Summa," I, xlviii, 2) with an orthodox explanation of the existence of evil in a created world, and was taken up by Spinoza ("Ethics," I, xvi) into his metaphysical chain of causes. From Bolingbroke it passed to Pope, who, in his "Essay on Man," developed it into a picturesque justification of the infinite scale of things, each right and happy in its proper place, so that there is no evil inherent in the nature of things, but only in the desire of man to escape from his ordained place; and through Pope and Shaftesbury and the other popular exponents of Deism, the doctrine entered into the very life-blood of eighteenth-century England. In 1757 Soame Jenyns, a gentleman and no metaphysician, had the temerity to publish a "Free Inquiry Into the Nature and Origin of Evil," in which the doctrine was supported unflinchingly by analogy to the orders of society:

> Thus, the universe resembles a large and well-regulated family, in which all the officers and servants, and even the domestic animals, are subservient to each other in a proper subordination; each enjoys the privileges and perquisites peculiar to his place, and at the same time contributes, by that just subordination, to the magnificence and happiness of the whole.

In a review of his friend's book Dr. Johnson exposed the hollowness of such an attempt to elude the reality of evil, with a directness of thrust and a clearness of insight which render his treatise one of the profoundest discussions of the subject in English or any other language; but the idea of subordination as a divine institution was, nevertheless, deeply implanted in the Doctor's own heart and is the secret of his magnificent Toryism: "Order cannot be had but by subordination."

In the larger sphere of life this very practical Deism showed itself in a stubborn alliance of religion with the British Constitution against the spirit of growth and innovation, in "such a view of this world and the next," to use George Eliot's sarcastic words, "as would preserve the existing arrangements of English society quite unshaken, keeping down the obtrusiveness of the vulgar and the discontent of the poor." And the same words, if warmed with a little genial humor, would describe those quieter backwaters of society in which the people of Jane Austen loved and quarrelled and married. She herself had never read St. Thomas Aquinas or Spinoza, we may suppose; but she was well versed in Pope and Johnson and their school, and, above all, her mind reflected like an untarnished glass the things that were very close to her. In her view the philosophical alliance of Deism took the form of a county life at the apex of which stood the parsonage and the park, and the universe resembles, indeed, a family, large enough for variety and human enough, however well-regulated, to admit the spice of temporary jars and misunderstandings. We shall not expect in such a society to see religion touched with the fires of spirituality or lifted above the needs and occurrences of the hour. No doubt it had its consolations for the soul, and its very lowliness gave it with the finer natures a pervasive reality. We feel this, for instance, in the calm sentences of Jane Austen herself after the death of her father: "Heavy as is the blow, we can already feel that a thousand comforts remain to us to soften it. Next to that of the consciousness of his worth and constant preparation for another world, is the remembrance of his having suffered, comparatively speaking, nothing." But in her fictitious world religion scarcely appears even as a preparation for death; it is rather an assurance of subordinate social position. There are two parsons who play a prominent part in her novels. One is the Mr. Elton by whom Emma tries to raise her dear Harriet in the scale of gentility, and the other is the egregious, sublime Mr. Collins, upon whom Mr. Bennet bestows the well-received parting advice: "But, if I were you, I would stand by the nephew; he has more to give." The real place of veneration was not the church, but the park or the Great House, and the spirit of worship was not so much the emotions of the human soul in the contemplation of God as a loyal acquiescence in the existing institutions of a restricted and self-sufficient society.

III.

That may seem, and indeed is, a narrow field for great fiction. The exclusions were enormous; out of that charmed circle must be kept not only the social unrest that was prowling hungrily all about it, but even the deeper passions of the individual breast that might endanger its artificial balance. But at least, as we see it reflected in Jane Austen's novels, this restricted field was not dull. For one thing she had, with all her unquestioning loyalty, as sprightly a vein of satire as ever lent salt to native wit. Hers was not the satire of indignation—of a Swift rankling with hatred of human nature, or even of an Addison, who, like a Shaftesbury in easy-chair, would laugh away the foibles and absurdities of society; it was rather the biting but jealous sarcasm that the members of a close-knit family indulge in among themselves, in the assurance of privacy. There is, for example, no more proper ass in fiction than the egregiously self-satisfied Mr. Collins, nor a more impertinent monster than his patron, Lady Catherine. Nothing could be more delicious than our enjoyment of their baffled and blinded conceit when they learn of Darcy's intention to marry Elizabeth. Who has not rubbed his hands with delight in reading the last impotent, majestic words of her Ladyship to Elizabeth—who has not read them with unlessened delight a score of times?—"I take no leave of you, Miss Bennet. I send no compliments to your mother. You deserve no such attention. I am most seriously displeased." Who, on reading Mr. Collins's delicate letter of protest, has not said with Mr. Bennet that he would not give up that gentleman's correspondence for any consideration: "After mentioning the likelihood of this marriage to her Ladyship last night, she immediately, with her usual condescension, expressed what she felt on the occasion"? These are the things that Swift would have called genius and that would have added fame to the wit of Addison. And yet, if we take heed, they belong with the satire neither of the "Tale of a Tub" nor of the Spectator. Their author would have entertained her dear sister Cassandra shrewdly enough with the impertinences of a Lady Catherine in real life, but she would never have questioned the authority of that dictator of county standing, and when her Mr. Collins at the end offers a "parading and obsequious civility" to Mr. Darcy he was, after all, only expressing in his foolish way her own half-conscious notion of the Church as the upholder of the great social law of subordination. Nor should we forget that the awful Mr. Darcy himself, the truest hero Jane Austen ever conceived, does not altogether escape the same satirical touches. Yet if his "pride" seems to the reader at times perilously like a solemn priggishness, his position and his estate and his conscious superiority are the unquestioned reward of the heroine who affects a "prejudice" against him. Georgiana may have "listened with an astonishment bordering on alarm at her lively, sportive manner of talking to her brother," but, by Elizabeth's instructions, "began to comprehend that a woman may take liberties with her husband, which a brother will not always allow in a sister more than ten years younger than himself"; and we, who have been taken into the smiling confidence of the author, soon learn that she permits herself privileges with her people which in the mouth of a hostile alien would have filled her with amazement and shuddering alarm.

And so this critical humor turns out to be only another enchantment to bind us in the artist's magic circle. Oftenest, indeed, it eschews ridicule altogether and is unmistakably sympathetic. We laugh at the vanity of Sir Walter Elliot of Kellynch Hall, but we love him for his good looks and his devotion to the Baronetage. We chuckle at Miss Bates's flow of rigmarole, but we know that of such is the kindly kingdom of the county town. We smile at Emma's blindness to the presumptuous infatuation of Mr. Elton for herself, and at her efforts to raise her dear Harriet to the parsonage, but we know all along that Harriet will finally marry the farmer, that Mr. Elton will take the proper person to the parsonage, that Emma will go submissively and joyfully to Donwell Abbey, and all will be rightly disposed in this little hierarchy. And if meanwhile we are impatient with the heroine for delaying the fated order of things, it is only in the spirit of the chiding owner of the Abbey: "Mr. Knightley loves to find fault with me, you know—in a joke,—it is all a joke. We always say what we like to one another."

If ever the wit of the novels loses this tone of family intimacy and borders on what may be called external satire, it is when the author deals with the things which, however they may seem to have sprung from the heart of her world, were yet the beginning and sign of the coming revolution. The satire of the new mystery-mongering in "Northanger Abbey" is not very serious, but it is the ridicule felt for something alien and disturbing to her own order of ideas. So too her criticism of Mrs. Dashwood and Marianne in "Sense and Sensibility" is in one way nothing like as scathing as the naked presentment of a Lady Catherine or a Mr. Collins; their foibles are handled with wonderful restraint and with evident hesitation to hurt, but when she says that "common sense, common care, common prudence, were all sunk in Mrs. Dashwood's romantic delicacy," she was really touching on a new and widely lauded trait of character from which she instinctively shrank as from something more dangerous to her ideals than the ugliest insolence and servility; she had in mind the ravishing inroads of the school of "sentimentalists" headed by Sterne. Nor had she any more sympathy with the other aspect of the romantic invasion. "It is very true," she makes her Marianne observe, showing thereby her rare skill in discriminating traits of character and seeing their proper limits, for otherwise Marianne was only less sunk in "romantic delicacy" than her mother—"it is very true that admiration of landscape scenery has become a mere jargon. Everybody pretends to feel and tries to describe with the taste and elegance of him who first defined what picturesque beauty was." It is significant that Catherine Morland of "Northanger Abbey" and the sentimentalists of "Sense and Sensibility" must undergo a certain purgation of the mind and heart before they can take their place in the final happy tableau, so to speak, whereas Lady Catherine and Mr. Collins, though they may shift their ground and accept Elizabeth as the actual mistress of Pemberley, yet suffer no change of character, and in their unredeemed state are an integral and undisturbing element in Elizabeth's reward.

IV.

And what is this reward towards which all of Miss Austen's heroines are moving? Marriage, forsooth—and why not?—and in the case of Elizabeth, we are happy to add, a magnificent estate and position by the side of a great county magnate. "It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife," is the maxim with which "Pride and Prejudice" opens, and we are sure that the wife will be supplied. It is strange, but this narrow world which Jane Austen portrays really believed that a magnificent estate and high position in the county were supremely desirable in themselves, and not as a means to something else; it seems to have thought that a man and his wife could live with contented conscience if they performed the duties and exacted the recognition belonging to their rank and authority. And the curious truth follows that, if we read the biographical annals of the age, we shall find that a considerable number of people did actually, within the limits of our poor human capacity, attain to peace and quiet joy in the possession of those worldly blessings, or, by some strange trick of the imagination, through contemplation of these things in the possession of others. An admirer of Tolstoy and the other modern idealizers of discontent may reject this happiness of acquiescence as ignoble and may denounce the religion of subordination upon which it rested as a betrayal of humanity; certainly they could exist only by the exclusion of many high aspirations and of some insight into the soul. But it will be wiser and more charitable, I think, to regard them rather as one of the momentary resting places of the human spirit, one of the illusions that comfort us in our long journey, and to feel grateful towards any author who, by whatever spell of art, is able to carry us back for a while to its shadows.

I would not exaggerate. It is perfectly true and obvious that the chief pleasure in reading Jane Austen comes from her almost miraculous knowledge of human nature within clearly prescribed limits. It is true that, when her genius flags, she can become dull and exasperatingly trivial. But withal, if we stop to reflect, we shall find that her power over us, whether to soothe or to annoy, depends also on our sense, perhaps only half-conscious, of that eighteenth-century philosophy as realized in the little centres of comparative calm which she represented so faithfully and which were already beginning to fade away.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

With the assistance of a very thorough analysis of the content and structure of the cycle of mystery plays known as the "So-called Coventry Plays" or the "Hegge Plays," in a master's thesis by my pupil, Miss Esther L. Swenson, I have, I think, made an important discovery with regard to that puzzling document. The plays were edited by Halliwell for the Shakespeare Society in 1841 as "The Coventry Mysteries"; but their real home, together with any possible explanation of their form, has long been a matter of perplexity. It is clear that the cycle has passed through certain stages of development, and these I find in convincing agreement with the records of the lost St. Anne plays at Lincoln. As regards dialect, style, and content, it is not a radical suggestion to locate the Hegge plays at Lincoln, and without going into these matters, it will be sufficient for me to give the outline of my argument with a few of the more obvious pieces of evidence.

The prologue of the cycle represents an earlier stage of development than the cycle itself, a stage when the plays were processional throughout. Parts of the cycle were rewritten to be acted on a stationary stage; other parts remained as they were, and no important changes were made in the prologue. Some pageants, it is hard to tell how many, were used in presenting the cycle in its final form. Much of the cycle was, however, on a stationary stage, and probably the audience did not move in any case. Many important differences between prologue and cycle can be accounted for as adaptations to a stationary stage. There is also evidence to show that the Lincoln plays were partly processional and partly fixed. One of the minute books of the cathedral chapter, quoted by Mr. A. F. Leach in his article in the Furnivall Miscellany, contains an entry for the year 1483 to the effect that the Dean and his brethren, on Saturday, the chapter day of June, "discussing the procession of St. Anne to be made by the citizens of Lincoln on St. Anne's day next, determined that they would have the play or speech [Mr. Leach reads sermonium] of the Assumption or Coronation of the Blessed Mary repaired and got ready, and played and shown in the procession aforesaid, as usual in the nave of the said church." They had borne the expenses of this play in 1469, but it was apparently not a regular member of the cycle when the action above mentioned was taken. The manuscript of the Hegge plays, which is dated 1468, shows the play of the Assumption of the Virgin written in a hand slightly later than that in which the body of the cycle appears, not a sixteenth-century hand, however, as Halliwell states. This may indicate the time when the play was added to the cycle, but in any case the record indicates that there were both processional and stationary features in the presentation of the Lincoln plays.

The records indicate that they once had a Corpus Christi play at Lincoln and that it was transferred to St. Anne's day. The series of plays in the Hegge manuscript dealing with the birth and childhood of the Virgin distinguishes it from other Corpus Christi cycles and may well point to some connection with the festival of the mother of the Virgin Mary.

The text of the cycle in the manuscript is divided into separate plays by large red Arabic numerals. The plays often run into each other without any break whatever in the action. The Lincoln trading companies were bound under penalty during the first half of the sixteenth century to provide pageants according to ancient custom. The manuscript divisions may indicate scenes for which certain gilds were still held responsible. You also find that each alderman was required to provide a silk gown for one of the "kings." This has been thought to refer to the Three Kings of Cologne; but there were only three of them and there must have been more than three aldermen. In the Hegge cycle there are no less than thirteen kings in the unique prophet play, which, by the way, foretells the birth of the Virgin and not of Christ, and is therefore distinctly a St. Anne procession. Finally, from the year 1564, there is preserved at the back of a corporation minute book a list of stage properties some of which had been used in the recently acted play of Tobias, and others had manifestly belonged to the defunct St. Anne's day mysteries. We have, for example, "hell mouth with a nether chap," "Jerusalem with towers and pynacles," "a tomb with a covering," and a "firmament with a fiery cloud and a double cloud." All of these seem to be required for the play of the Assumption. It is not remarkable in the case of the first three, but with regard to the last mentioned strange piece of stage mechanism, it is much more significant. In the play of the Assumption in the Hegge cycle the Virgin Mary before her death expresses a wish to see the apostles, whereupon St. John arrives upon a "white cloud"; later St. Peter and St. Paul arrive together upon "diverse clouds." There are other smaller items that I could mention; but this is perhaps sufficient to indicate the basis upon which my contention rests, and I shall hope to carry the matter further at a later date and in another place.

ONE VIEW OF THE WILSON ADMINISTRATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit one of your old subscribers, who has never been in entire sympathy with the political sentiments of the Nation, to express his gratification that, amid your profuse praise of the Wilson Administration, you have found tongue to give us the editorials, in your last issue, on "The Bryan Scandal" and "The Consuls' Safeguard."

If your pungent criticism of the bestowal of ambassadorships and other high diplomatic posts to men whose only known qualifications are wealth and contributions to the Democratic campaign fund, is somewhat belated, it is just.

The pitiful degradation of the great office of Secretary of State to the level of a Mrs. Jarley Wax Works Show was going on for weeks before the thick-and-thin Wilson papers opened their eyes to the shame.

President Wilson is, of course, entitled to be judged fairly. His literary skill, his creditable record as a college administrator, his well-intended efforts and, at least, partial success as Governor of New Jersey, appealed to many of us who could not see our way clear to vote for him.

I hope it is not narrow or malicious partisanship that has led some of us to think that, in some of his acts, he has been weak where he should have been strong; while we do not ignore the meritorious things he has done.

But it is very hard for those of us to think that the terms "great," "masterful," "admirable," which have been so prodigally showered upon him, are connoted by such acts as signing the Sundry Civil Appropriations bill, retaining the self-advertising Bryan in his Cabinet, and the two other Secretaries who interfered with the course of orderly justice in the Diggs-Caminetti cases; or in selecting for foreign ministers men who have virtually bought these positions by money-gifts or by flattery.

Already the fruit of the exemption of farmers from the operation of the said appropriation bill is seen in the act of cotton planters in combining to keep a fictitious price for their product.

Unfortunately for all officials, from President down, inexorable history judges them by those acts which are lasting in effect; and they are remembered more for their errors than for their merits. President Grant did some excellent things during his two Administrations; they have been absorbed "in the sweet presence of a good diffused," but the venality and corruption of some of his trusted advisers have tarnished his memory.

Possibly the one act by which President Cleveland will be longest remembered—certainly it is one to which reference is constantly made in foreign countries—is his unwise Venezuela message. All this may be unjust; but such is the fate of statecraft.

"THE LION'S SHARE."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is there a more striking example of the slipshod character of current literary allusion than the constant misuse of the expression "the lion's share"? Archdeacon Stuck, whose recent ascent of Mt. McKinley has given him distinction, is cited in the American Review of Reviews as saying ". . . when I talk about Alaska, I mean the interior, which is the lion's share, though the other Alaskas would each make a great State." And hardly a day passes in which one does not hear or read a similar use of the phrase, although the fable of the lion in partnership, the sole source of the expression, makes the king of beasts claim "the whole thing." So pertinent is the phrase, in many legitimate applications, that it is a pity it should be spoiled by persistent misuse.

AN EARLY GENERAL INCORPORATION ACT IN NEW JERSEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is generally agreed that the first act granting freedom of incorporation for any business purpose in America was a New York act of March 22, 1811, which conferred this privilege on groups of five or more persons associating with capitals of not more than $100,000 for carrying on certain forms of manufacture.

It is not widely known, however, that after four or five years of agitation (as indicated by the legislative records, 1812-1816) a similar law was passed in New Jersey (Public Act of February 9, 1816, p. 17). Except for doubling the minimum number of associates and the addition of a section intended to insure the education and moral well-being of the children to be employed by the corporations thus to be established, this statute is closely modelled after its New York predecessor; in fact, for the most part it is a verbatim copy, even to the use, in all but the added section, of the New York designation "trustees" instead of the New Jersey term "directors."

Unlike the New York act, which was kept in force and extended in scope, the New Jersey law endured only three years. On February 11, 1819, two years before it was due to expire by limitation, a repealing act was rushed through the Legislature without a single dissenting vote. And it was not until 1846 that freedom of incorporation for business purposes was again authorized.

The undersigned is desirous of knowing to what extent, if at all, this early New Jersey act was utilized, and the reasons why it was so readily repealed. During the years it was in force, and indeed until 1821, no special acts of incorporation were passed in that State for purposes covered by the act, although twelve such charters had been granted between 1811 and 1816. The period was, of course, one of business depression, but a number of charters were taken out under the New York law at this time; and a section of the repealing act suggests that some corporations had been formed under the New Jersey law. Has the episode come under the notice of any of your readers?

GREEK-AMERICANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Many American journals have commented on the number of Greeks who went from this country last winter to their old home to fight against the Turks; but the significance of the return has not been overemphasized. Every American traveller in Greece this year has stories to unfold of cordial reception by the Greek-Americans. "Hello, mister, what State you come from?" was a very common form of salutation not only in Athens but also in the smaller towns of the Pelopennesus. Nor is this strange, since conservative estimates place the number of Greek soldiers who had been in the United States at from fifty to sixty thousand. Most of them, to use the phrase in Percy Mackaye's "Gettysburg," were mere boys. They had been in all parts of this country; and they spoke all kinds of English. Some who had been here six or seven years spoke very little English indeed; but many of these had been in mills and had lived in the Greek colonies. Some of the most fluent (and occasionally one heard excellent English) had been going to night schools. Undoubtedly at times a Greek-American would engage in conversation with a traveller to impress his friends at home with his knowledge of English. But more frequently such an encounter was a token of genuine friendly feeling and to a certain extent a greeting to a fellow-countryman.

As a class these soldiers were alert and intelligent; to a prejudiced observer they seemed to have had their wits sharpened in the Western world. They were devoted to Greece, as was indicated by the fact that many had seen the hardest kind of service; and that many naturalized American citizens were to be found among them. They were, or seemed to be, equally loyal to their home in the new country. Almost to a man they looked forward to returning here after the war; indeed, many had left their younger brothers in charge of shops and business during their absence. Many spoke of the fair chance which America had given them to make their living, and to get ahead. Of scores with whom I talked I heard from only one of unfair treatment; he had been under a dishonest railway foreman. To hear the comments of these men on our institutions served to make one a better and more liberal American.

Most significant of all is the influence, intangible but positive, of the fact that these citizens of two countries are spreading among the common people of their old home knowledge of life and institutions in this newer land. Is there any parallel in history to the return of such large numbers of men who speak gladly and proudly of their new home while fighting and dying for their native land?

KLUCHEVSKY'S "RUSSIA."

A History of Russia. By V. O. Kluchevsky, late Professor of Russian History in the University of Moscow. Translated by C. J. Hogarth. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 2 vols. $5 net.

By the death of Professor Kluchevsky (1839-1911) Russia lost the most distinguished student of her native history, a scholar who united a talent for painstaking, minute investigation of sources with a capacity for viewing Russian history as a whole and making bold and original generalizations as to its general tendencies. One of his services to science was a detailed examination of the historical material contained in the lives of the Russian saints, a vast body of narratives of which the greater part are still unpublished; another was the formulation of a new theory of the origin of serfdom in Russia, one of the most vexed questions of all Russian history. Serfdom, he showed, took its rise not from any one edict of the Government, but, on the Government lands, from the taxation system of Muscovite Russia, with its principle of collective responsibility; and, more important, on the private lands, through the gradual decline into servitude of a class of tenant debtors. The authorities, by the legislative enactments that paved the way for serfdom, were merely guarding against the agrarian disorders that grew out of the indebted condition of the peasantry.

As a young man, Kluchevsky became known for his special investigations in early Russian history. (An excellent sketch of his activity is given by Professor Bogoslovsky in the Zeitschrift für osteuropäische Geschichte, III, 309-318.) At the University of Moscow he won equal fame as a popular expositor; "he always lectured in the largest auditorium of the University, and it was always filled to overflowing." In 1902 he began the publication of his lectures, of which he issued four volumes before his death; a fifth and concluding volume may be soon expected.

The first two volumes of this "Course of [Lectures on] Russian History," concluding with the extinction of the older Russian dynasty in 1598, have now appeared in an English version, previous to their translation into German or French. It is a wholesome sign of the growing interest in Russian topics that a translator and publisher could be found for such a work. For, despite the English title (unwarranted by the original), Kluchevsky's volumes are not a history of Russia, but a series of learned essays, dealing with successive aspects of the economic, social, and institutional development of Russia, and addressed to a public that is assumed to be already acquainted with the main facts of Russian history. Furthermore, the author makes little effort to preserve strict historical proportions in his discussion, but dwells with pardonable fondness on topics that have been the subject of his own special investigation, such as the growth and economic importance of the Russian monasteries. At home his lectures have appealed to the general reader and gone through repeated editions; in England and America they will be relished only by earnest students of history.

To such students Kluchevsky's work offers a rich reward. From Rambaud's chronicle of seemingly unrelated happenings one turns to it with real delight. Russian history was moulded by economic forces. Kievan Russia grew up along the great commercial route that connected the Black Sea with the Baltic; Kiev depended for its prosperity on trade. This trade, and with it the special importance of Kiev, passed away when the Russian princes became unable to defend the lower course of the Dnieper against barbarian incursions. The population retreated to the west and to the northeast; from the union of the latter colonists with the Finnish aborigines came the Great Russian stock. In the central plain of Russia, covered by forests and intersected by rivers, there grew up petty principalities, dependent for their existence, despite the forests, on agriculture rather than trade. The migratory rulers of Kievan Russia, with their roving bands of followers, were replaced by sedentary princes, who regarded their small appanages as their private property; public and private law became fused into one. When these appanages were united under the rule of Moscow, methods of administration fitted for a petty state had to be remodelled to suit the needs of a vast empire. Slowly the autocracy grew up, while internal dissensions were held in check by the clearly recognized need for union against foreign enemies. The administration of the empire developed on entirely different lines from those of Western Europe. An Anglo-Saxon reader is startled to learn how Ivan the Terrible introduced local self-government, with elected officials, as a means of centralizing his power, or how he established a sort of Parliament, the zemski sobor, in order to obtain more effective coöperation among his own officials.

At every step Kluchevsky supports his generalizations by a few well-chosen, convincing, concrete illustrations. Neglecting the petty quarrels of warrior princes, he always holds before us the picture of a whole society. He passes over even the military glory of Dmitri Donskoi; the princes of Moscow "were remarkable for their consistent mediocrity" (I, 315). Economic and social forces are Kluchevsky's heroes. Yet, when an individual really had a potent influence on the nation, he does not belittle his significance; to Ivan the Terrible he devotes a chapter of trenchant political analysis, reminding one by its literary charm of the work of Macaulay or Green. One may regret that a writer with such striking gifts of exposition failed to construct a systematic history of his country instead of a series of brilliant essays.

The preceding remarks are based on a study of Kluchevsky's work in the original. To the English translation no such hearty praise can be given. If technical discussions of ancient Russian conditions, dealing, for example, with the origin of pomiestie land tenure and the gradual fusion of it with otchina proprietorship, are to be made accessible to English readers, they should be translated with absolute accuracy. This is no easy task in a work bristling with legal terms, which often have no satisfactory equivalents in English, and abounding in heavy, involved sentences that require entire reconstruction to meet the demands of English idiom. But the difficulty of such a problem is no excuse for publishing an unsatisfactory solution of it. Mr. Hogarth makes the impression of a conscientious student, but one liable to occasional lapses of attention, and not quite adequately prepared for the work that he has undertaken. He ordinarily gives faithful translations of difficult passages, remodelled into excellent English, and shows discrimination in translating, or leaving untranslated, Russian legal terms; on the other hand, he will make blunders, due not only to carelessness, but to actual ignorance of the Russian language. Some of these mistakes are only amusing, as when Mr. Hogarth states that Sophia Palæologus "was known throughout Europe for her wit" (II, 17), instead of for her extreme corpulence; others are so serious as to impair the usefulness of the work as an historical authority.

Fully to justify so sweeping a condemnation would require more space than is here available. A few instances must serve as types. The Russian word soslovie means a class in society; the four present sosloviya are the nobility, clergy, townsfolk, and peasantry. Mr. Hogarth could hardly defend himself for rendering it "corporate body" (II, 312), as applied to the classes of mediæval Europe; he errs still more in extending the idea of corporateness to Russian conditions. Thus his sentence, "All these jurisdictions . . . were institutions corporate in their class character" (II, 289), reads in the Russian merely, "All these jurisdictions had [lit. wore] a class character." In the sentence, "Now, was the general corporate character of guba administration a sign that in the state and among the nation at large there had begun to make itself felt a need for supporting or strengthening the joint action of the inchoate corporate classes in the work of government?" (II, 277), the words "general corporate" translate a Russian adjective meaning all-class, extending to all classes, and the second "corporate" should be omitted. The following statement is peculiarly misleading: "The essential points which comprised the basic principle of the obstchina (namely, common tenure of lands), may be said to have been (1) compulsory equality of apportionment, (2) strictly corporate character of the commune, and (3) a joint guarantee" (II, 207). Here the second item should read, "the strictly class significance of the obstchina"; the point being that only peasants could belong to the nineteenth-century Russian commune, and that a peasant could not ordinarily forfeit his membership in the commune without the commune's consent.

The following miscellaneous parallels may illustrate Mr. Hogarth's liability to error even in matters of crucial importance. (The Russian text used by the reviewer was that of the second edition of the second part of the "Kurs Russkoi Istorii," Moscow: Mamontov, 1908):

Constantine dispatched to Kiev the Greek Metropolitan Archbishop, with . . . his own (the Emperor's) cap — the cap, with its golden brim and its crown of carnelions, of which Augustus of Rome made so light. (Hogarth, II, 22.)	Constantine dispatched to Kiev the Greek Metropolitan Archbishop, with the imperial crown from his own head (that is, the Cap of Monomakh), and with a carnelion cup, from which Augustus, the emperor of Rome, had made him merry, and with a golden chain.
To call a man a boyar meant, in those days, not that he had been born one, but that he had been promoted to be one. (II, 44, 45.)	To say boyarship [obsolete legal phrase] to anyone meant to announce officially to a person that he had been promoted to be a boyar.
To-day our Tsar hath been set these three days in his chamber! There is it that he dealeth with affairs. (II, 64.)	At present our Tsar locks himself up with two others in his bedchamber, and with them transacts business of all sorts.
The land hath been ruled by ourselves, its Tsars, and not by judges or voievoedi, by devices or conceits. (II, 69.)	The land hath been ruled by ourselves, its Tsars, and not by judges and voievodas, not by commanders and captains.
The dues rendered by the local tenantry consisted of a monetary due, a cereal due, festival offerings, and tolls of 5 shocks of corn per vit—all of which (with the exception of the tolls, which cannot well be appraised) might be translated into . . . These examples are clear enough. Yet data are to be found which would seem to refute them. (II, 215.)	The dues of the tenants consisted of a rent in money and grain, of a money payment on holidays, and of five squirrels per vit. Converting all this into our present money, except the squirrels, which I cannot appraise, we find . . . . The cases cited arouse no perplexities. But we meet with data such as puzzle the investigator.
Of kormi there were three kinds — namely, tolls levied when a new local official entered upon his post, tolls levied once only, and tolls levied annually, at the seasons of Christmas, St. Peter's Day, and Eastertide. (II, 249.)	The kormi were [of two sorts], the entrance dues [levied when a new official took office], which were levied but once, and the yearly standing dues, namely, those levied at Christmas, St. Peter's Day, and (in some places) at Easter.
While authorising boyars and okolnichi to dispense justice . . ., it forbade such officials to accept either "pleadings" (in modern parlance, briefs) or posts supernumerary to their judicial functions. (II, 252.)	It ordains that the boyars and okolnichi shall dispense justice, but that they shall not take "gratuities" [hribes] either for court service or for "caretaking," that is, for private mediation or services out of court.
To decide such questions joint sittings of the Duma and the Synod were held; which gatherings went by the name of sobori or conventions, and were altogether distinct from lay sittings of the Duma. (II, 262.)	To decide such questions there were summoned joint sessions of the Duma of Boyars and the Holy Convocation [Osvyashchenny Sobor]. Such sessions had the special name of sobori, which must be distinguished from the zemskie sobori [to which Kluchevsky preseutly devotes a whole chapter of his book].

Repeated errors of this sort are a most serious blemish in a work of primarily scholarly interest. They do not make one cease to be grateful for Mr. Hogarth's labors, but they dull the keen edge of one's gratitude. To point them out is not a pleasant task. One longs for the coming of a time when the same standard of accuracy shall be required of a writer on Russian literature or history, or of a translator from Russian, that is now expected of a student of German literature or history, or of a translator from German. Mr. Hogarth's work is more than that of a dilettante, less than that of a well-trained scholar.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Open Window. By E. Temple Thurston. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

The Odd Farmhouse. By the Odd Farmwife. New York: The Macmillan Co.

Familiar essayists, homilists, and nature chroniclers are increasingly prone to give their wares a coating, or at least a tinge, of fiction. There is a growing commodity of books which are "neither hay nor grass," neither fiction nor essay, but something between. By the same token, the number of confessed books of essays of the lighter sort diminishes. No doubt it is easier to follow in the general direction of the Autocrat than of Elia, and we suppose there is more profit in emulating "Reveries of a Bachelor" or "Prue and I" than in depending upon the casual flow of prose fancy.

"The Open Window" is the work of an Englishman who may have heard of neither the Bachelor nor Prue; but it is written in a similar vein of plaintive sentiment. The annalist is supposed to be an old vicar in his quiet parsonage with its books, his garden with its birds and flowers. There is an old wife, still beautiful, for whom he continues to cherish the romantic emotions of youth. She dies in the middle of the book, leaving him alone with a daughter, the only child, who is, however, "her mother over again," and who promises never to leave him. But, of course, the wooer comes, and the vicar must see that his child does not suffer for his sake. We leave him, returned to his lonely home after the wedding, and visiting in turn the chambers of his lost daughter and his lost wife.

"The Odd Farmhouse" is more in the vein of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." The American woman married to an Englishman has figured in more than one book of this general sort of late. In this instance, however, she is an American woman of quite uncommon cleverness and charm. In place of the familiar smartness and flippancy, the "bright" comments on British customs, there is a quiet flow of real humor, an unforced commentary on a very pleasant kind of life by a person ripe enough in mind and heart to deserve such a life. The married pair who stumble upon "the odd farmhouse" in a quiet corner of England have been through a hard apprenticeship of work, and relish their freedom as only the long-imprisoned can: "Now we get drunk on sunshine, liberty, and leisure. 'Time hath made me his numbering clock' once, so now I have the perfected sense of time; I waste it with a conscious luxury. I squander, but I know the worth of every minute, unlike the bored, rich people round us, whose leisure is a kind of mould and mildew—a fungoid resulting from disuse of life."

Diamond Cut Diamond. By Jane Bunker. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co.

"I now have a very simple recipe for a jaded one who wishes to gather the quintessence of excitement in an evening: Just rush out of a house where somebody is about to be arrested and make your way from Sixty-somethingth Street and West End Avenue to a Hundred and Forty-fifth Street in the dead of night with a million dollars' worth of somebody else's diamonds in your stocking!"—The publishers tell us, with the superfluous cunning of their trade, that a great and well-known lady of the pen masquerades under the name of "Jane Bunker." Does Mrs. Rinehart, of Pittsburgh, suppose that the possessor of this "very simple recipe for a jaded one" could be any other compounder of detective thrills and merry delights than the author of "The Circular Staircase" and "The Amazing Adventures of Letitia Carberry"? And, in the sentence quoted, she has been kind enough also to furnish the jaded reviewer with his recipe. The old maid of the story finds herself in just the situation described, and the fun of the thing is to see how she defends herself and the diamonds against stratagem and siege until the mystery of the ownership is solved. Not the least original feature of the plot is the introduction of a reporter who is not wiser than Sherlock Holmes and stronger than Sandow.

Margery Fytton. By Alice Ridley. New York: Duffield & Co.

Some of the most ancient and honorable materials of British fiction are here. The Fyttons have dwelt for centuries in an old, dark, gloomy country-house, which is a county show-place by virtue of its architectural purity. The family has a motto:

Swart and comely, lissom and tall,
We are the Fyttons of Fytton Old Hall,
Fytt-ones to rank with the best of you all.

In such fashion, with the content and rhythm of an American college yell, did the pride of old England assert itself. The incumbent squire, Hugh Fytton, is worthy of his lineage, a tall, dark, stern man, who worships the family name and the family estate. His hopes of a male heir have been disappointed, but the daughter to whom his wife has at last given birth is to be the heir for all that. The wife dies, and a packet of letters is found which betrays the fact that the girl is not a Fytton at all. Thereupon the true Fytton turns harshly upon the false one, and makes a will in favor of a hitherto despised nephew. After that the right and satisfactory sort of thing happens. The nephew is a rough diamond, born in Australia, and therefore clumsy of hand and unruly of hair. Margery hates him. He adores her. He does not wish to accept his inheritance, and tries to restore it to her, but such things are not done in England. There is only one way out, and that, of course, has been predestined from the beginning of time.

Succession. By Ethel Sidgwick. New York: Small, Maynard & Co.

In this story Antoine Edgell, the youthful genius of "Promise," again appears as leading figure. The earlier narrative, it will be recalled, left him on the threshold of remarkable achievement as a violinist. His English father had given up the attempt to make an English boy of him, had withdrawn him from the public school in which he was so hopelessly out of his element, and had turned him over to the care of the French grandfather and uncle, who would be sure, at least, to make the most of his bent for music. The grandfather is a composer of note, the uncle a martinet under whose rule Antoine becomes master of the violin. In point of time, this record brings us along only a few years further than the earlier one.

There are not a great many events to be chronicled. Antoine studies his instrument, always more or less at odds with his teacher. He makes a friend or two, but remains essentially a solitary. He plays at a few concerts, and succeeds—when his nerves and sensibility are not too much for him. He differs from normal youth in his retention of childish simplicity. He weeps easily, his speech has the elisions and the fancifulness of infancy. We suspect that most male readers may get rather tired of his artlessness, in the course of these five hundred pages. Probably the rule is that if you can endure the "artistic temperament" at all, you can endure any amount of it. Your attitude towards such a person (in fact or in fiction) as Antoine Edgell, depends upon whether you accept or reject the allegation of his genius. In "Promise" Miss Sidgwick did make her Antoine a moving figure, even in the eyes of less sympathetic readers: a kind of lost seraph he seemed, pathetically groping in an unfamiliar world. But we can have too much of pathos. The prattle and fatuity of greatness are, after all, blemishes rather than charms; let genius be adored, but not because it is an ass.

The Charming of Estercel. By Grace Rhys. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

"Historical romance" has earned a bad name for artificiality. The great figures which are trotted out upon these amateur stages as a rule are stuffed with straw. The great events involved become spectacular episodes arranged for the convenience of the romancer. The style is a broken lingo of obsolete words and modern slang. Very rarely do we come upon a narrative to suggest, even remotely, the vigor and ease of a Scott or a Dumas. This story at least does that. It is not a great romance, but it is a good one, spontaneously and skilfully told. The occasion is the uprising of the North of Ireland, under Tyrone O'Neil, and the expedition of Essex, sent forth by Elizabeth to put an end to the rebellion. But the occasion remains a setting for the romance proper, which has to do with a youth and a maid among the followers of Tyrone. Both are of gentle blood. Estercel, the hero, is a lad of prodigious size, strength, valor, and simplicity; his Sabia is the slender and tender damsel of old. Estercel has a marvellous horse, who plays an important part in the story. Various improbable, not to say impossible, events occur, before we are done with the pair. In short, we have here the ancient materials of romance. But they are not dealt with in a commonplace or perfunctory manner. It is clear that the author has enjoyed her graceful labors. The style is charming, with a suggestion of archaism in its rhythm and subtler turns of phrase, rather than in its vocabulary. A few slips into the modern vernacular may be noted; but they are very few.

SAINT FRANCIS.

Life of St. Francis of Assisi. By Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C. New York: Longmans, Green, & Co. $3.50 net.

Whenever St. Francis in his reading came upon a passage which stimulated his thought, he would read no further, but closed the book and pondered on what he had read. He who should read Fr. Cuthbert's volume by such a method would be long in coming to its end, for the passages worth pondering are many. Here are a few that carry some effectiveness even in brief quotation:

Francis' turning towards religion did not raise a barrier between him and the earth, but the earth itself became transformed in his sight and gave him a new joy. In earlier days he had regarded it with a certain eager reverence as the scene and circumstance of high chivalry; now he looked upon it with even greater reverence because of this new life revealed in it, and found in it an even greater joy.

It were easy to brand the dissident brethren as weaklings in their vocation or as traitors to Francis. That some of them merited to be thus branded is doubtless true. But for the most part they sincerely reverenced Francis and were proud to own him their leader. They felt the stirring of his spirit and gladly responded to it, as far as it was in them to respond. With these the trouble was not of their own making; it was the perennial difficulty found by a multitude in accepting as a guide in life, an ideal which demands a clear, spiritual insight and a more than common aloofness from the set ways of the world. In such case men suffer because of a lack of the rare simplicity required for the perfect understanding and realization of the ideal life proposed to them. They are pulled by two loyalties and are apt to cut an unheroic figure in consequence. And yet were it not for such men the world would be much the poorer morally and spiritually. They retail the spiritual life much as the ordinary student retails the message of a master, and it is through the more commonplace intelligence that the genius permeates the world.

The mystic of all ages has held that life itself cannot be adequately measured by the mere logical faculty of the mind, but only by the intuition of the whole personality when attuned to the truth by moral as well as mental discipline.

Among the longer passages that bring especial pleasure are the clear account of the place of the early Franciscans in town and village life, and the finely humanized description of the valley of Rieti.

Fr. Cuthbert's work is the first scholarly English biography of St. Francis. In its general plan and in its thoroughness it is very like Sabatier's familiar "Vie de S. François." Since that book was written the fervor of Franciscan study has brought to light a number of important documents, and has clarified many problems that were then obscure. Fr. Cuthbert thus has the advantage of being able to use much new material. In tone the English and French biographies differ greatly. The earlier one is instinct with dramatic imagination, the later is weighty with mature reflection. Sabatier's Francis moves surely and rightly, but not without a certain sharpness of change from scene to scene. Fr. Cuthbert's slower study is more careful in the tracing of the least transitions.

The "Nihil obstat" warns the reader at once that nearly all of the traditional material is accepted as true, yet there is nothing polemic in this quiet ordering of the legend. And the life of the book is not in its treatment of fact or story; it is in the patient, sympathetic, sensible reconstruction of the inner experience of St. Francis. The analysis is constantly reasoned, and reasoned with finished cogency. "This was indeed the man," one feels; and such knowledge of such a man is to be treasured. Not for all is the life he led—nor did he ever claim it was for all—but life can hardly fail to be a finer thing for understanding of the way he viewed it.

Fr. Cuthbert overemphasizes the importance of Francis's knowledge of the romances of chivalry. The early chroniclers are doubtless right in ascribing to him certain interesting references to the stories of Roland and Arthur; but it is surely too much to say that "Francis' idea of obedience was in truth drawn from the romance of chivalry," and to find so often a romantic basis for Francis's thoughts and actions. In attributing to Francis the knowledge and use of Provençal, Fr. Cuthbert is quite unjustified. The passages he has in mind indicate familiarity with French, not with Provençal; and there is no reason to believe that the troubadours ever visited the towns of central Italy. Any good modern history of Italian literature would have set Fr. Cuthbert right on this point; he refers to Fauriel!

More frequent specification of dates would have been helpful. As it is, one has often to turn back half a dozen chapters, tracing statements in terms of months and seasons, to ascertain the year of a particular event. There are many misprints, the saddest of which transforms poor brother Juniper into "brother Jupiter." The illustrations are from remarkably fine photographs of scenes in Umbria.

From the eligible list thus procured appointments will be made during the coming spring for service in the Philippine Islands, beginning with the opening of schools next school year.

The changed conditions affecting the world's supply of food and mechanical energy were the main subject of Prof. H. N. Dickson's presidential address in the Geographical Section of the British Association. The waterfalls of the Alps, for instance, are converting northern Italy into one of the world's great industrial regions, and possibly vast manufactures will soon be carried on in what are now the immense agricultural regions of China, worked by power supplied from the great coal deposits of Shan-si. Referring to the changes in transport conditions, he said that they tend to make the road motor of incalculable importance in the future development of food-producing areas. Dr. W. S. Bruce, in a paper on Spitzbergen from the economic and political standpoint, urged its immediate annexation by Great Britain in order to protect the claims of British subjects, which are predominant there.

The July number, just out, of the American Journal of International Law opens with the presidential address of Senator Root, delivered at the last meeting of the American Society of International Law in April of this year. It happened that the first day of the Society's annual meeting was just fifty years after President Lincoln's promulgation of Order No. 100, embodying instructions for the government of armies in the field; and as the principal work of formulating these instructions was performed by Prof. Francis Lieber, Mr. Root deemed it appropriate to consider and review the career and services of that distinguished author, whom the writer of this note remembers as often appearing at Union meetings held during the period of the Civil War, and occasionally speaking, very clearly and impressively. Bluntschli is quoted as crediting Lieber, in the Instructions, with inspiring him to undertake his own works on international law. The force of this American example is admitted by Sir Henry Maine (whom Mr. Root does not quote), who said, twenty-five years ago: "This example—the formation of a practical Manual stating for the officers of each nation what exigencies they were to be prepared for in actual contest and how they were to deal with them—was followed by Germany, by England, and by France, and some of these Manuals have been adopted by smaller Powers." Mr. Root summarizes his services as a scholar, and incidentally as a soldier under Blücher, when he was wounded in the battle of Waterloo, and again on the field of Namur, where he was left for dead. Mr. Edwin M. Borchard has an important paper on "Basic Elements of Diplomatic Protection of American Citizens Abroad." It was necessary to consider the subject in several aspects, such as legal relations between citizens and States, between States and aliens resident therein, and between States themselves, with respect to their rights, and their responsibilities in case they have been guilty of delinquencies. The writer declares correctly that the history of the relations between citizens and States is largely a history of the transition from the system of personal laws to the territoriality of law. This has been accompanied both by a growing control of a central power over the individuals within its jurisdiction and by the feeling that territorial independence and sovereignty are essential qualifications for admission of a State into the society of States. He cites the fact that Congress exercises the right to regulate certain acts of United States citizens abroad, and to attach prescribed consequences to violations. He concludes that diplomatic protection, as a governmental function, results from the very nature of the State. Besides a lengthy paper on the sovereignty of the air in relation to aviation, and one on the position of the prisoner of war, should be noted the complete opinion of Justice Lurton, for the United States Supreme Court, in the Charlton case.

It was Frederic Harrison to whom occurred the fantastic idea that a great writer, possessed of a volumnious book-knowledge and as comprehensive an intellect as Gibbon, might some day eodify the world's imaginative literature, as Cæsar and Napoleon codified the world's laws. Ernest A. Baker's "Guide to the Best Fiction" (Macmillan), so amplified a version of an earlier publication as to be virtually a new work, is perhaps a step in such a direction; it attempts to list all worthy works of fiction in English, including translations, and to characterize the contents and style of each summarily and instructively. It must be adjudged that in spite of the obvious difficulties of the task the author has produced a guide of great value to students, librarians, and writers. What faults it has are rather on the side of deficiencies than positive defects. The compiler might with justice have spoken of his undertaking as Dr. Johnson did of his dictionary—"to deliberate whenever I doubted, to inquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end and perhaps without much improvement." If completeness be a test, the guide is by no means infallible. "English and French Fiction Before 1600" is a list which makes little pretence to a scholarly fulness, and there are other departments in which the design of the book as a popular, rather than an exhaustive, work of reference, has crowded out desirable material. Lacunæ are more evident from the fact that in modern literature there is such a repletion of entries on the side of ephemeral and inferior works as repeatedly to provoke exclamation at the inclusion of the word "best" in the title. Only those acquainted with the terrifying output of present-day fiction can appraise the indiscretion of admitting by wholesale writers born but into oblivion, even on the ground that "every age is most interested in its contemporaries."

The author's definition of fiction is at times open to serious criticism, as when he excludes imaginative travel—e. g., Borrow's "Wild Wales"—and novels of propaganda—e. g., Sinclair's "Springtime and Harvest"—to include "Lavengro" and "The Jungle." The general arrangement of the book again, and a serviceable index, facilitate search for particular items. But it is annoying that in the frequent instances in which a pseudonym has been used the author's real name does not appear in its alphabetical position; that with no other books listed by title, there is not a general heading for anonymous works, and the "Nova Solyma," for example, falls under N; and that many important short stories, published separately in some editions, in collected form in others, receive no specific mention. A cultivated reader might well be pardoned for knowing no more of T. N. Page than "Marse Chan," which is not listed; and many might look for a brief description of "The Gentle Boy," or "Christ in Flanders," or at least be anxious to learn in which general volume it is contained. To American literature is given a special and bulky chapter, but that of South Africa, Canada, and Australasia, no longer insignificant in quantity, is included with the mother country's. The lists of translations of ancient Greek and Latin and ancient and modern Asiatic fiction will be found especially valuable, and approach comparative completeness. One service the author has rendered is in calling the publishing world's attention to the want of translations of much of the better work of such writers as Gautier, About, and de l'Isle-Adam—to mention France alone.

Prof. Goldwin Smith's "Correspondence" (Duffield), selected and edited by Arnold Haultain, covers the long span of years from his student life at Oxford in 1846 until his death at Toronto in 1910. His letters, as one would expect, are of unusual charm on account of their style and the author's vigorous personality; and they are of value to the student of history and politics because of the keen-edged criticisms with which Canadian and English problems are discussed. For he had a truly great intellect; "vastiest Goldwin" he had been called at Oxford. Among his intimate correspondents were such men as John Bright, Cobden, J. S. Mill, Matthew Arnold, Morley, Bryce, Frederic Harrison, the third Earl Grey, and Lord Rosebery. To J. X. Merriman, Premier of Cape Colony, who, with a view to South African Federation, had asked Goldwin Smith questions in regard to Canada's constitutional experience since 1867, Goldwin Smith expressed himself with characteristic frankness and incisiveness. When the Boer War broke out Merriman in return supplied him with some thunder for his anti-Jingo campaign in Canada. The only two Canadian papers which opposed the war were the two to which he contributed, and in opposing it they lost half their circulation.

For half a century and more Goldwin Smith stood like a great rock in a river, breasting the current powerfully with his arguments and essays, but not greatly checking its mighty sweep towards the sea of party-government, pseudo-democracy, militarism, imperialism, and Irish Home Rule. It is sad to see how he was disappointed in some of his fondest hopes and in his expectations of men in public office. He believed the union of Canada and the United States would come as surely "as the rising of to-morrow's sun." He deplored the extension of the suffrage in England; "factory hands are bad material for a nation; they are mere human hammers and spindles; they have no patriotism in them." "The first consequences of the blind extension of the suffrage are a narrow escape from Dismemberment (by the first Home Rule bill), and the appearance, in the person of Mr. Gladstone, of Demagogism in its most powerful, its most malignant, and its most destructive form. Nothing can be either more tragical or more instructive than this man's moral fall." And he found Gladstone's great opponent no better: "Dizzy's life has been one vast conspiracy—the first object of which was the gratification of his own devouring vanity, the second the subversion of Parliamentary government." Goldwin Smith was vigorously opposed to Home Rule, believing, after much study, that what the Irish need is land, not political self-government. "If, however, self-government is to be conceded, I should be for four Provincial Councils. This would save Ulster from political submersion." In American politics he was often distressed by "the malignant influence of the Irish with their dynamite and blatherskite," and by "the corrupt wing" which they formed in the Democratic party. He had supposed they joined the party because attracted by the name, but a letter from Andrew D. White makes the interesting historical suggestion "that it was not their liking for the word 'Democratic' which influenced them in this matter, but their hatred of the word 'Whig.' In the thirties and forties, when the main tide of immigration started, the party opposing the Democracy was the Whig party." Goldwin Smith was strongly opposed to protection, and thought President McKinley "had the worst way, a hypocrite half deceived by his own hypocrisy." "The election of Roosevelt," he wrote in the summer of 1904, "will be a disaster," but of Cleveland he had a high opinion. Of his work as professor of history at Cornell, there is almost nothing in this volume—a kindly sketch of Ezra Cornell, and of Ithaca, in 1868, and the statement ten years later that "the students are mostly poor, frugal, and industrious. We have lately been invaded by the athletic mania, but I hope not in a very virulent form."

Though much has been written of late on the literary qualities of the Old Testament, there has been no general chronological survey of the subject and this is what Prof. H. T. Fowler, of Brown University, proposes to give in his "History of the Literature of Ancient Israel from the Earliest Times to 135 B. C." (Macmillan). Without discussing questions of date and authorship he adopts the most recent critical views, taking his material in the order of time without regard to the arrangement of books in our Bible. Nor, beyond a note on the form of Hebrew poetry, does he attempt any statement of canons of literary criticism—he simply passes opinion on the various pieces as they come up. Such historical and exegetical remarks are added as are necessary to make clear the historical setting of the books and passages examined, and to explain what is obscure in them. His method enables him to bring out the development of thought and style in the Old Testament, from the naïve poetry and narrative of the earlier time to the finished productions of the later period. His literary and theological judgments are generally just; there is, however, here and there a strain of excessive enthusiasm. A comparative study of an ancient literature like the Hebrew would add value to the description of it. The reader would like to know what in the Old Testament is general Semitic and what is distinctively Hebrew; how the prose narrative stands related to the Arabic prose; wherein the lyric poetry agrees with or differs from the Greek; what is the literary influence of the Hebrew intense nationalism. Such a study would tend to give breadth of view and distinctness of critical judgment, and would probably modify such sweeping statements as those made on pp. 177 (on Deut. v-xi) and 364 (on the praise of love in Canticles). But the view of the literature given by Professor Fowler is attractive in style and instructive in content, and the volume should find a wide circle of readers.

"Rhetoric and the Study of Literature" (Holt), by Alfred M. Hitchcock, is intended as a textbook for the last two years of the high school. The feature of the book consists in an attempt to join the study of composition with that of literature in accordance with the writer's belief that while the earlier secondary training in English should be confined to expression exclusively, the later work should seek to correlate composition and literary criticism "within reasonable bounds." Agreeably with this idea—which, Mr. Hitchcock declares, is coming to prevail—his volume falls into two distinct parts: an English composition, pretty much of the usual type, and a rapid sketch of the history of English literature by periods. The gap between the two is bridged by a constructive study of the most important literary types—prose fiction, the drama, the essay, and so on. In this way the whole subject is approached from the side of original composition. Now, if this is indeed the proper angle—if literature should be studied to illustrate rhetoric and not contrariwise, then Mr. Hitchcock's book seems a good one for the purpose. To be sure, it has its failings—an excessive timidity of classification and definition, of anything that might possibly be construed as dry and dogmatic—figures of speech and punctuation, for instance, are relegated to the limbo of an appendix—a corresponding inclination to substitute persuasion for prescription, and what seems like a curiously underlying distrust of the pupil's faculty and inclination for the work. But these seem to be failings of the movement; and as a whole the volume is unusually simple, straightforward, and intelligible.

In "Culture, Discipline, and Democracy" (Christopher Sower Company), under a somewhat forbidding exterior, and in a style at times Teutonic in complexity, Prof. A. Duncan Yocum, of the University of Pennsylvania, presents what at first glance appears to be an unusually careful and well-reasoned discussion of the issue between culture and "preparation for life." We are not sure that the first glance is wholly misleading, but some of the conclusions are staggering—for example, that in the curriculum of the future the present status of required and elective subjects will be largely reversed, and the basis of education will be literature, history, sociology, civics, and economics, while mathematics (outside of simple arithmetic) and foreign languages will be treated simply as preparations for a specialty. Yet one must admit that a subject which in no wise finds its way into life hardly accomplishes the purposes of culture, and that discipline for discipline's sake may defeat its own purpose. Moreover, there is reason in the suggestion that the present boundaries of the sciences are too finely drawn for educational purposes, and that, in the secondary schools, at least, a course in "science" would be more to the point. In the end, however, it looks as if the writer were a victim of that presupposition which underlies most of the talk about "education for life"—namely, that even an educated mind can discover nothing for itself, and that one can neither cook nor vote without a special course in cooking or voting.

Frederic Stanhope Hill, author and publisher, died last week at his home in Cambridge, Mass. He was born in Boston in 1829. Early in life he went to sea, and during the Civil War was an officer in the navy. From 1890 to 1903 he was editor of the Cambridge Tribune. He was the author of several books, among them "Twenty Years at Sea, or Leaves from My Old Log-Books," which was written for boys; "The Story of the Lucky Little Enterprise," "The Continuity of the Anglican Church, A. D. 61-1900," "Twenty-six Historic Ships," and "The Romance of the American Navy."

Science

A gratifying indication of the distance to which good work reaches is seen in the liberal citations of American studies in a recent report on "Our Artesian Waters" in Australia, by R. S. Symmonds, published with permission of the Minister for Public Works (Sydney). The report includes a number of extracts and plates from M. L. Fuller's "Controlling Factors of Artesian Flow," and from F. W. Clarke's "Data of Geochemistry," both published by the United States Geological Survey, and cites opinions of Hilgard, Darton, and Daly, American geologists. The large volume of water obtained from deep borings has permitted its extensive use in irrigation in certain Australian areas, here described in some detail. Other topics of importance are the neutralization of alkali, the gases of artesian waters, and the interesting theoretical question of the source of artesian waters. For the Australian cases the author ascribes the water, at least in part, to deep-seated rocks, and not to infiltrated rain water.

The "Household Bacteriology" (Macmillan), by Estelle D. and Robert Earle Buchanan, is said to be for students of domestic science, and is also prefatorily described as a revision of the lectures given for some years past to students of home economics at Iowa State College. The title misleads the reader a little, for many forms of microörganisms are considered, including even various pathogenic protozoa. To yeasts and moulds much space is given, perhaps too much, in the text, besides an appendix with nearly forty pages of "key" to the common moulds. The general reader can pick up an immense amount of interesting information here, but, on the whole, one wonders what the mind of the home economist may be like. The information is usually very good, sometimes surprisingly fresh, and there is often a practical outlook of considerable value; but in general there is a lack of definiteness, and the application is not always as obvious as it should be in instruction for young domestic scientists. Almost a third of the book belongs to a section on microörganisms and health, and here, except in discussing milk and water, the authors are evidently on unfamiliar ground. Concerning water purification, it may be said in passing that the practical results with the ultra-violet rays as well as with ozone have not been as good as the account here given would lead the reader to suppose. Illustrations are numerous, and many of them are very clear and good; a few are hard to understand. The index at first glance seems to be very full, but it really has many gaps. Both index and text need careful revision with a Latin grammar and dictionary. The worst linguistic sin is "fomite" (p. 308), but there are others.

I. G. Gibbon, who wrote a book on the question of insurance for the unemployed, has now made a study of the experience of insurance against sickness which has come from the compulsory form in Germany since 1884 and from a voluntary form in Denmark since 1893, and publishes his results with the cover-title "Medical Benefit in Germany and Denmark" (Dutton). Extended appendices deal chiefly with the conflicts in Germany between the medical practitioners and the societies for sickness insurance. The new German law, only partially in force when the book was written, is incorporated in the text, but of its working little or nothing is as yet known. There is necessarily much detail in the presentation of the subject, and the material may not easily be condensed for the general reader. The more important conclusions indicate: that the medical insurance should be mainly for medical services and not for general support, and that some corporate action on both sides is desirable, but to be tempered with some individual liability; that there should be democratic organization and administration in the corporate groups, and also a generous measure of freedom; and that emphasis should be laid on educational work in insurance. The problems of medical benefit are not merely those of insurance, but are intimately bound up with social conditions. Solutions may not be given offhand, and there is much need of careful consideration and judicious planning; the adjustment can only be gradual, and disturbances must be expected.

Prof. John Roble Eastman, astronomer, died Friday at Franklin, N. H. He was born at Andover, N. H., in 1836, and graduated from Dartmouth College in 1862 with the degree of M.S., receiving a Ph.D. from the same institution in 1877. Professor Eastman was an assistant at the United States Naval Observatory at Washington from 1861 to 1865, and professor of mathematics, U. S. N., 1865. He was retired for age in July, 1898, with the rank of captain. In June, 1906, he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. He had been engaged in astronomical observations, computations, and research since 1862, the bulk of his published work appearing in the annual volumes of the Government Observatory. He was the first president of the Washington Academy of Sciences, and was in charge of the meridian circle work at the Observatory from 1874 to 1891. Under his care was prepared and edited the "Second Washington Star Catalogue," which contains the results of nearly 80,000 observations made at the Naval Observatory, 1866-91. He was the author of "Transit Circle Observations of the Sun, Moon, Planets, and Comets," 1903.

Drama

LONDON THEATRES.

LONDON, September 20.

It is a number of years now since the name of Ibsen was first heard in England and a select little group of British dramatists and actors set to work to reform the British drama, with an earnestness of which they never lost an occasion to assure the public. Indeed, so much was heard about the reformation, that that part of the public which takes itself seriously began to believe there was such a thing, and to imagine it was to be elevated and somehow strengthened by going to the theatre. Many declared that nothing remained but to get rid of the censor; others were convinced that the crowning touch needed was a National Theatre; and altogether enough noise was made to create a general impression that something was going on and that the drama in England was in an uncommonly active, intellectual, and, above all, ethical condition.

I have often had my doubts. Often, in my skepticism, the British drama has seemed to me much where it was before the name of Ibsen was heard in the land, except for the difference in themes and technique that time is bound to bring with it. For the last two or three years I have been inclined to think that not even so much as this could be said for it—that, on the contrary, the British theatre is sadly deteriorating. Ragtime and "revues" at the music halls, moving pictures at the "Cinemas," have so debauched the public taste that the drama has been having a pretty hard fight for survival, and last winter depended for success principally upon American farces, very amusing some of them, but still with no pretence of being anything save farces. Therefore, the announcement that this autumn season would open with plays by Bernard Shaw and J. M. Barrie was received with a good deal of interest, for Shaw and Barrie have been honored as two of the chief prophets of the new dramatic gospel, through all these reforming years.

To begin with Shaw's, since it was the first given. It has been put on the stage at the St. James's Theatre by those accepted modern pioneers and masters of stage production, Mr. Granville Barker and Miss Lillah McCarthy. Its title is "Androcles and the Lion," and it is described on the programme as a "fable play," a convenient and suggestive description, for a fable does not deal with realism, but may be full of the esoteric meaning looked for from Shaw, with the good, sound moral insisted upon nowadays tagged on at the end. The fact that he chose the early Christians as the subject upon which to build up his fable, nobody need quarrel with. One of the characteristic, periodical, solemn discussions has just begun in the London papers over the performance of "Joseph and His Brethren" at His Majesty's, the disputed point being the reverence, or irreverence, of adapting a Biblical subject to the modern stage. One of the correspondents, the Rev. Mr. Campbell, of the City Temple, goes so far as to compare such adaptations to the miracle and mystery plays of the Middle Ages, quite forgetting the difference between religious plays given by the church for the benefit of the people and religious plays given by the popular stage-manager for the benefit of his own pockets—quite forgetting, that is, that it all depends on how the adaptation is made and to what purpose. And so with Shaw's fable—everything depends on the treatment, for the early Christians are to a large proportion of the public as sacred subjects as Joseph or any other characters in the Old Testament, and if they are chosen as a modern dramatic theme, it is not unreasonable to expect that this is not through mere caprice, but for some sensible and appropriate reason. But Shaw has used them, to judge from the way he has used them, for no better reason than caprice—for his own amusement in once more bewildering the admiring audiences who are determined to hear in his every mood the voice of a prophet, while, all the while, he sits by, I rather suspect, with his tongue in his cheek.

The play opens with the familiar old story of Androcles and the lion that children of my generation used to read in one of their first reading books. I do not remember that it there had any connection with the early Christians, but by making Androcles an early Christian this connection is easily supplied without hurting the prejudices of the most orthodox. After a little, not very funny, sparring between Androcles, whom his wife calls "Andy," and the wife, whom Androcles calls "wifie-pifie," the lion appears and, as in the old story, Androcles pulls out the thorn from his "footsems-wootsems," and then, in Shaw's new version, the two waltz together from the stage. One smiles at this buffoonery, for the lion is really a very nice, Christmas-pantomime lion. At Drury Lane, or as a turn in one of the popular "revues" at the music halls, it would bring down the house. But is this exactly the sort of success the serious dramatist seriously reforming the drama wants?

Two acts follow. In one, the early Christians, mostly silent supers, are on their way to Rome and the arena; in the other, they are in Rome and gathered just without the arena waiting their martyrdom. In both acts there is a little mild, vapid fooling. A beautiful young Christian among the prisoners flirts—the word is Shaw's—with the Roman officer, and addresses him as "handsome Captain." A big, fiery-tempered brute of a convert finds nothing so hard as to turn the other cheek for the blow and ends by killing six gladiators in the amphitheatre, instead of being killed by them, and, as a consequence, is pardoned and welcomed to his service with open arms by the Emperor. A poor coward goes through farcical agonies of fear and, in a mad dash for freedom, rushes into the lion's jaws—a fate which, deserve it as he may, one might think scarcely a matter for laughter. There is an occasional serious passage, as when the "handsome Captain" asks the beautiful Christian to define her God, and she tells him that to define God we must be Deities ourselves. But the mild fooling, with the dash of seriousness, drags terribly at times, and of all dramatic crimes this is the worst. The end is foreseen from the beginning. Androcles and the lion meet in the arena, they recognize each other, and the lion refuses to eat Androcles. There is a bit of horseplay when the lion chases the Emperor up and down the stairs of the amphitheatre, a rough-and-tumble scene that would not disgrace a Harlequinade. The lion and Androcles then have a second dance and march off the stage arm-in-arm. The curtain falls.

What does it mean? That is the question earnestly asked by Shaw's admirers. Because the Emperor, at one stage, says that the Christians who refuse to burn incense to the gods are committing suicide when they go into the arena, suffragists look upon it as a suffrage fable, or sermon, and the inevitable suffragette interruption has occurred at one of the performances. Others have found consolation in the truth set forth that faith gives strength to the weakest, for it must be confessed that the early Christians as Shaw shows them are not of the stuff martyrs are usually supposed to be made of. And many still seek the answer, no doubt the more impressed because it is impossible to find. But looking at the play dispassionately, and not through the Shaw glamour, I see in it nothing but farce, with a subject that is as the poles apart from farce, indeed, so far-fetched as farce, so well-calculated when thus used to shock a large majority of the public, that it is hard not to believe it a deliberate bid for the sort of réclame Shaw should be willing to dispense with, now his position is assured. Moreover, the play depends for its fun, not upon the gay, whimsical humor that has redeemed many of his extravaganzas, but upon cheap jests and cheap clowning more in place on the music-hall stage.

To turn to Barrie is scarcely more encouraging, or I might better say it is less encouraging, for as two of his plays are now performing at the Duke of York's, there is the double chance to put him and his art to the test. By this time everybody knows that, on the first night, the first of these two plays received a tremendous ovation, and the second was hissed. In the meanwhile, the second has had one act cut out—the reason, perhaps, why it is still running and may possibly have a long run. As far as I am concerned—though in this I differ from most of the London critics—there is little to choose between the two. The first, in one act divided into three periods, tells the story of "The Will," from the earliest version made by the devoted young husband at the outset of his career, until the last made by the embittered widower at the end of the career which was more prosperous than ever the young man could have hoped. That the enormous success of "Milestones" would give a vogue to the three-period play, and that its authors would find imitators, it was safe to predict. The surprise is that Barrie should be the first to follow the lead. But here we have again the influence of time as a theme and its passing expressed in the dress and on the faces of the actors, and in the change of furniture—slight in this case, because the scene is a lawyer's office, where the chance for change is small except in the royal portrait hung above the mantelpiece: first Victoria, then Edward, and last George. The device in itself is not sufficiently novel to arrest attention, and the play which hangs upon it is of feeble interest. It is a fable with a moral, if you will, and the comfortable moral that leaves nobody in the least shadow of a doubt, but is as naively obvious as in the old Sunday-school tale of the Idle Apprentice. Nor is the story told with special subtlety or charm. The dialogue is thin, the sentiment thick. As a curtain-raiser that will pass, but will not set the theatre in England or anywhere else on fire; it probably would have been dismissed, but for the magical name of Barrie.

The second play, "The Adored One," or "Leonora," as I believe it is to be called in America, is described as a "legend," but a fable with a moral would have been a more appropriate description. The story is simple—as obvious in its plot and its sermon as "The Will." Leonora is the old-fashioned woman with charm, to whom anything and everything can be forgiven, even murder. She has killed a man by pushing him from the railway carriage because he refused to leave the window shut after she had represented to him that her child had a cold—a legend not possible outside of Barrie's fairyland. But so potent is Leonora's old-fashioned charm that friends, counsel, jury, and judges are all conquered by it and unanimously and joyfully acquit her. It may be said that, on the face of it, such a tale is fantastic, and should be so taken. And so I, for one, was prepared to take it all through the first act, when I was amused by the Leonora of Mrs. Patrick Campbell, who has not only the right charm for the part, but the right feeling for light comedy, and who shows, as few other actresses could, how the once admired type of woman may unite a number of different sorts of women in her own fascinating personality. She puts one in a good humor for whatever may follow. But, unfortunately, what follows is not fantastic: it is foolish—a preposterous scene in court which might be endured were dull burlesque its only fault, but which is unendurably silly. Leonora flirting with the judge, exchanging confidences with the jury, being proposed to in the witness-box by her counsel, innumerable other absurdities as flagrant piled one upon another, becomes impossible, her charm evaporates. And no lightness of touch, no delicacy of humor, relieves the burlesque.

Some critics have seen the offence in the fact that all this tomfoolery centres about a murder, too serious a subject, they say, for jest, though they might as logically have objected to Shaw's making a jest of the early Christians waiting for the lions. That the burlesque business is tedious is, as in Shaw's fable, the real offence. Even the burlesque topples over like a house of cards when, in the end, the judge, summing up in his judgment, tells Leonora that her type of woman, the woman of the past, is gradually vanishing, and that another, stronger, more independent woman, with less charm, is coming to take her place: all this said as solemnly as if Barrie really meant his "legend" for the problem play inaugurated by Ibsen, and the judge's speech for an equivalent to the discussion with which "The Doll's House" and the long succession of problem plays derived from it have ended. As well might a moral be tagged on to "La Belle Hélène" or "Orphée aux Enfers." Shaw is wiser in leaving his audiences to draw a moral for themselves.

These new plays by two of the leading British dramatists of the day shake one's faith in the value of reform and set the thoughtful to asking whether, after all, Barrie and Shaw are so great an advance on Robertson, with his cup-and-saucer school, and Sardou, whose "Diplomacy" has so successfully met the test of its present revival that it has already run for two hundred nights at Wyndham's. Does "The Adored One" come really closer to life than "Ours" and "Caste"? Does "Androcles and the Lion" preach a finer sermon—and it is a sermon that Ibsen has made the fashion in drama—than "Diplomacy"? Do not people still go to the theatre to be amused—or interested, which is the same thing—and is not the failure of the two plays due to their not amusing, not interesting, to their being dull? And if the censor is abolished and the National Theatre established, what guarantee is there that a fine national drama will be the result, when any number of private enterprises, from the Independent Theatre of the eighties to the Stage Society of to-day, have failed to produce it? Art, whether of the stage or the studio, is not manufactured, not created by protection: it "happens." N. N.

Two new plays are now to be seen in the Lyceum Theatre in this city, "The Younger Generation," by Stanley Houghton, and "Half an Hour," by J. M. Barrie. The former is an amusing trifle, freshly conceived and cleverly written, which would be more praiseworthy if the humorous observation and skill in characterization revealed in it had been tempered by a little sober reflection. It deals with the revolt of the adolescent family of a smug Manchester merchant, James Kennion, a regular chapel-goer, still governed, in externals, by the Puritanical notions in which he was reared by his grimly religious old mother—against the moral and social restrictions imposed upon them. The youngsters are encouraged in their rebellion by a jovial uncle, who has passed most of his life in the freer intellectual atmosphere of Germany, and who remembers some of the escapades in which he and his precise brother, James, indulged when they were boys together. James is not pleased when reminded of these adventures, but regards himself as a brand saved from the burning, and is inclined to think that the world is coming to an end when his eldest son, exhilarated by unfamiliar liquor, tries to kiss the housemaid, and subsequently, unrepentant, demands more liberty and a latchkey; when his daughter encourages a perfectly honest suitor without taking him into her confidence, and when his youngest boy, aged eighteen, ventures upon the desperate profligacy of a hotel supper, with sherry and bitters, after a golf match. Much legitimate fun, and some sound social and domestic philosophy, are extracted from these incidents, which are handled with no little theatrical dexterity, while all the various personages are drawn with a light, vivacious, and realistic touch. The main contention upon which the piece is founded, that over-severe discipline may provoke the very excesses against which it is directed, is trite enough to be proverbial, and the troubles of Mr. Kennion, a ridiculous and foolish old Pharisee, are doubtless the logical results of his own narrow and tyrannical policy, but the moral implied in some of the illustrative examples and precepts, that youth, male or female, in its most perilous period, may be safest when left to its own instincts and resources, is opposed to all human experience. This is not a serious work. The primary object of it is laughter, and it does not call for severe criticism by high standards, but jests at the expense of the finer human instincts are dangerous even in farce.

"Half an Hour" will add nothing to the high reputation of Mr. Barrie as a dramatist. It does, indeed, contain an ingenious, if wholly incredible, melodramatic situation, but nothing really vital or human or anything suggestive of the literary facility or quaint, humorous, whimsical, illuminative fancy by which much of his other stage work has been distinguished. It is possible that he intended it as a burlesque satire upon some of the recent emotional sex dramas, but of this intent there is no indication upon the surface, either in the wording or in the manner it was acted at the Lyceum. Symbolism or irony must be manifest to be effective. He presents two intensely unreal, conventional, theatrical figures. Lillian Garson, an exquisite, dainty, high-spirited, penniless aristocrat, has sold herself to a brutal millionaire husband, whose maltreatment does not fall short of physical violence. After a bitter quarrel, in which she opposes cold scorn to his brutal ferocity, she decides to flee with a lover, leaving behind her her jewels and wedding ring and a note of farewell. In the second scene she joins her lover, who goes out to make some final arrangements and is killed by a motor-'bus. The doctor, summoned in the emergency, realizes that she is not wife or widow, and bids her depart if she would save the dead man's memory from scandal. So, in despair, she returns homeward in the hope of forestalling discovery, and, in the third scene, appears as hostess of her husband's dinner guests, among whom is the very doctor who has been a witness of her tragedy. He, recognizing her at once, amuses the company with a minute recital of the experience through which he has passed, the guilty woman—whose one anxiety is to regain possession of her note and jewels before it is too late—exhibiting a deep but innocent interest in the relation. Garson, who has found the jewels, but not the note, is stirred to sudden suspicion by a chance remark that eloping wives always leave their trinkets and a note behind them. He turns fiercely upon his wife, but by this time she has the tell-tale note crumpled in her hand, and smilingly chaffs him as he vainly hunts for it. For this moment of suspense apparently the piece was written. In the end she lies herself triumphantly out of her scrape and her deluded husband sullenly apologizes and goes in to dinner, while his wife—after showing it to the doctor—throws the incriminating note into the fire. What Sir James Barrie meant by a tale so extravagant in its coincidences and in its delineation of character is a problem. From first to last, it is crammed with glaring inconsistencies and improbabilities, while the dialogue is in no way remarkable. If he simply wished to try his hand at a thriller, it is to be hoped that this one experiment may content him.

The other new Barrie comedy, "The Will," which is fully described in the London letter preceding these notes, has just been produced in the Empire Theatre here. John Drew played the three ages of the central figure, the financier, with uncommon skill and notable comprehension. He has done nothing so well in the way of character delineation for years. He was particularly effective as the middle-aged, purse-proud, selfish merchant, and exhibited a degree of passion, as the broken-hearted millionaire in the final scene, of which few playgoers probably thought him to be capable. Frank Kemble Cooper also furnished a notable picture of the old lawyer, whose broken utterances furnish the moral comment which is the object of the piece. This, of course, is the ancient saying that the love of money is the root of all evil.

Music

Among the vocalists engaged for this season's concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society are Matzenauer, Gerville-Réache, Ottilie Metzger, Julia Culp, and Jacques Urlus. The violinists to be heard as soloists are Mischa Elman, Carl Flesch, Jacques Thibaud, and Leopold Kramer (the Philharmonic's new concert-master). The pianists will be Teresa Carreño, Harold Bauer, and Max Pauer; and the violoncellists, Jean Gerardy, Leo Schulz, and Beatrice Harrison, who will make her first American tour. Also there will be Henri Leon Leroy, first clarinet of the Philharmonic, and Xaver Reiter, first horn. At the Young People's Concert, Kitty Cheatham will be the soloist. The Philharmonic will have the coöperation of the St. Cecilia Club (Victor Harris, conductor) in the performance of Liszt's "Dante" symphony.

The New York Symphony Society, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, will again give its concerts at Aeolian Hall. There will be eight Friday afternoon subscription concerts, and sixteen on Sunday afternoons. The first will be on Sunday afternoon, October 26, when Mme. Gadski will be the vocalist. The list of soloists includes also Louise Homer, Margarete Matzenauer, Maggie Teyte, Oscar Seagle, Carl Flesch, Fritz Kreisler, Kathleen Parlow, Alexander Saslawsky, Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes, Wilhelm Bachaus, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, George Barrère, Gustave Langenus. Among the pieces to be played are: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5; Brahms, Serenade in D; Chausson, Concerto for piano, violin, and string orchestra; Debussy, C., Suite "Le Printemps" (first time); Elgar, Sir E., Symphonic Poem, "Falstaff" (first time in America); Ennesco, Rumanian Rhapsody; Fanelli, E., Tableau Symphonique, "Thèbes" (first time in America); Handel, G. F., Concerto grosso No. 7; Kolar, V., Symphonic Suite, "Americana" (first time); Loeffler, C. H., La Villanelle du Diable; Strauss, R., "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Theodore Presser, in addition to being one of the great musical educators of the American public through his admirable periodical, the Etude, and otherwise, has founded a Home for Retired Music Teachers. It is situated in Germantown, Pa., in one of the most desirable parts of the city. The contract for the new building was let a few days ago. It will cost $136,000 without painting or the furnishings. It will, in fact, be like a beautiful private hotel, with as little of the institutional idea as possible. It will accommodate sixty-five inmates, and no expense has been spared to make the building as commodious, comfortable, and even luxurious as possible. Mr. Presser has guaranteed the future of the institution.

Arthur Mees is again acting as conductor of the Worcester, Mass., music festival, which is extending from September 29 to October 3. Among the artists who are heard are Mme. Schumann-Heink, Evan Williams, Florence Hinkle, Herbert Witherspoon, Lambert Murphy, Reinald Werrenrath, Arthur Philips, Mary Jordan, Alice Eldridge, Mme. Sundelius, William Wheeler. The programmes include, besides a number of classical and modern vocal and instrumental numbers, two large choral works, Verdi's Requiem and Gabriel Pierné's "St. Francis of Assisi." American composers are not forgotten, Arthur Foote being represented by his "Omar Khayyám" suite, and W. H. Humiston by his "Southern Fantasy."

A quadrille for two pianos, the principal themes of which are taken from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," has been found among the papers of the late Emanuel Chabrier and will shortly be published.

Commenting on the discovery of the complete manuscript, in Verdi's handwriting, of a History of the Popes, the London Telegraph says: "It seems marvellous that the composer should have found time, in the intervals of opera writing, to carry out a literary task of such importance and magnitude." Some of those intervals between operas were, however, long enough to give time for almost anything. After composing "Aïda," Verdi rested on his laurels sixteen years before he produced another opera, "Otello." The only thing he composed in this period was his Requiem.

G. Schirmer's September Bulletin of New Music gives timely information regarding the operatic novelties to be produced in New York and other American cities this season. The Metropolitan Opera Company's list includes Victor Herbert's "Madeleine," Charpentier's "Julien," and Strauss's "Rosenkavalier." Hammerstein's novelties will be Massenet's "Thérèse" and Erlanger's "Aphrodite." Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII" will be done by the Century Opera Company. The Boston Opera promises Février's "Monna Vanna," while the Chicago company's list includes Franchetti's "Cristoforo Colombo" and Kienzl's "Ranz des Vaches."

No less than eight concert halls have been erected in Berlin within the last ten years. Three of them have a seating capacity of 1,500 to 1,600, one of 1,200, while the others are smaller.

A history of conducting ("Geschichte des Dirigirens"), by Georg Schünemann, is among the latest German books. The third volume of the Joachim correspondence ("Briefe von und an Joseph Joachim") also has just been issued.

Far better than most of the songs that come at present from across the ocean are some of those composed by Henry Holden Huss. They are not only good as music, but effective in the concert hall. The same American composer's sonata for violin and piano, opus 19, is among the pieces that have recently come into favor. Prominent virtuosi, like Kneisel, Spiering, and Ysaye, have played it in public.

Art

Lee Warner is publishing for the Medici Society "In the National Gallery, a First Introduction to the Works of the Early Italian Schools," by Mrs. C. R. Peers.

Mrs. Bearne's book "A Court Painter and His Circle: François Boucher (1703-1770)," issued by T. Fisher Unwin, is a biography of the artist and in some sense a reflection of the life of his period.

The Metropolitan Museum issues an illustrated "Catalogue of Romanesque, Gothic, and Renaissance Sculpture," under the editorship of Joseph Breck, assistant curator in the department of decorative art. By the inclusion of medals, plaquettes, and ivories, a sensible course under the circumstances, the catalogue numbers exceed three hundred, of which the majority fall in the Gothic period. Mr. Breck has taken his editorial task with due seriousness. The pieces are fully described, all relevant literature is cited, and problems of attribution are briefly discussed. In every scholarly respect the work is creditable, being more minutely accurate than the run of similar European catalogues. There are more than eighty half-tone cuts, which, however useful, make the book pretty heavy in the hand. An impression on lighter paper would be a distinct convenience to visitors to the Museum. This catalogue constitutes an extraordinary record of growth. Seven years ago the Metropolitan Museum contained no original Renaissance or mediæval sculpture of note, except a damaged but fine altar back by Andrea della Robbia. In 1907, through the generosity of Mr. Morgan, the older portion of the Hoentschel collection was lent to the Museum. This added at once something like 200 examples of sculpture, mostly of a minor decorative type and of Gothic period. Mr. Morgan soon added to this loan the remarkable transitional tomb sculptures from Château Biron, fine instances of the pathetic and realistic manner that superseded Gothic stylism. In the last five years by purchase the Museum has chiefly built up the weakest department, that of Italian sculpture. Here it has naturally been impossible to acquire works of monumental dimensions. Instead the Museum has wisely concentrated upon those works in which the artists' touch is most evident—terra-cottas and small bronzes. As to the scope of the present collections, which are rapidly growing, both in North and South European examples, it is possible to illustrate from originals the main types from the twelfth to the end of the sixteenth century.

Among objects of capital importance in the Italian school, we may mention four angels very close to Giovanni Pisano in style, a terra-cotta Madonna by Donatello, another of Verrocchio's early time, an altar back by Andrea della Robbia, a Nativity by Antonio Rossellino, a graceful angel by Matteo Civitale, a portrait relief in marble by Pietro Lombardo, a magnificent bronze Madonna by Jacopo Sansovino, a fine portrait bust of Simone Contarini by the Venetian Alessandro Vittoria. One may add perhaps a gold plaque minutely worked in repoussé and ascribed to Benvenuto Cellini. If one recalls as well a small but choice group of the best Renaissance medals and small bronzes, one will see that the materials for original study in this field are already considerable. Great gaps in the collection there necessarily are. Nothing adequately represents the Michelangelesque movement; such admirable craftsmen as Adam Krafft and Peter Vischer are absent; the realistic school of Mazzoni is not exemplified; the Campanian school of the Hohenstaufen revival is virtually missing. Here it should be said that the casts elsewhere exhibited in the Museum may help the student, that some of these desiderata mentioned above are quite unattainable, while such as are to be had will doubtless be drawn in by a department commanding large funds with wide knowledge and unbounded zeal. This is not the place to raise technical issues. If it were, we should ask why the bronze genius ascribed to Verrocchio's school should be regarded as an ancient piece. Let us rather close upon the note of congratulation for a remarkable buying campaign now handsomely supplemented by the useful and scholarly catalogue.

Deputy Henri-Charles-Etienne Dujardin-Beaumetz, for many years Under Secretary of State for Fine Arts in the French Cabinet, died at Limoux, France, on Saturday, in his sixty-first year. He was an artist by profession and was awarded a medal at the French Salon of 1880, but he afterward gave himself up to politics and was elected Deputy in 1889 and continued to be a member of the Chamber until his death. Most of his pictures were devoted to military subjects.

Sir Alfred East, A.R.A., president of the Royal Society of British Artists, died Sunday in London, aged sixty-three. He was a cavaliere of the Order of the Crown of Italy, an associate of the Société Nationale des Beaux Arts, Paris; honorary associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, honorary member of the Meiji Bijutsu Kai of Japan, of the Société Royale d'Aquarellistes of Belgium, and the royal academies of Milan and Stockholm. Sir Alfred East was represented by his works in galleries all over the world. His Returning from Church is in the Carnegie Art Gallery at Pittsburgh, Pa.; A Passing Storm in the Luxembourg at Paris, A Haunt of Ancient Peace in the National Gallery of Hungary, London at Night in the Milan National Gallery, The Morning Moon in the Art Institute at Chicago. The White Carnival in the Brussels National Gallery. In 1906 he published a book on "The Art of Landscape Painting in Oil Color."

RAILWAY EFFICIENCY.

When the Eastern railways' application for advanced rates was denied by the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1911, Commissioner Prouty took occasion to refer to the statement made by Mr. Brandeis that $300,000,000 per annum could be saved by "scientific management," and made it clear that he did not concur in any such opinion. He said:

> Upon this record we can hardly find that these methods could be introduced into railroad operations to any considerable extent, much less can we determine the definite amount of saving which could be made. We cannot, therefore, find that these defendants could make good any part of these actual advances in wages by the introduction of scientific management (Opinion 1508, p. 279).

Few people not actually concerned with the operation of railways know how much the principle of "scientific management" has increased railway efficiency in the past twenty years. This increase can readily be illustrated by a few simple figures. It may be assumed that the best measure of a railway's "efficiency" is its average "revenue train-load," i. e., the average number of ton-miles of revenue freight carried in each train-mile, which is the same thing as the average number of tons per train. A little consideration will show why this is the case, and it needs no detailed demonstration. Twenty years ago the "average train-load" of all the railways in the United States was, in round figures, 170 tons, and the average revenue per freight train-mile was about $1.52. In 1893, with the exception of Mr. James J. Hill, on the Great Northern Road, and the possible exception of one or two other men who knew what he was doing, virtually no railway managers were giving any direct thought to the matter of train-load with the idea of greatly increasing it. It was not until the reorganization period in the middle nineties that full recognition began to be given to the importance of the question, and probably the Northern Pacific reorganization did as much to focus attention upon it as did anything else. The reason for this was that Northern Pacific, with virtually the same traffic density as that of Great Northern and operating under conditions almost precisely different, was bankrupt, while Great Northern was prosperous, mainly because for every train-mile run Great Northern carried about 100 ton-miles and earned about $1 more than did Northern Pacific. Northern Pacific's reorganizers saw that all they had to do was to "pick up" this 100 ton-miles and this $1 per train-mile, which in due time they did, with results known to all. And by the later nineties all railway managers were striving to increase train-load as the quickest way to increase of profits. The so-called "Hill methods" were applied in all directions.

The result is clearly to be seen in the comparisons which follow:

(All railways in the United States according to Poor's Manual.)

Year.	Revenue train-load (tons).	Freight train-mile revenue.
1893	170	$1.52
1896	188	1.55
1903	314	2.35
1911*	403	3.01
1913 (our estimate)	415	3.05

*Last year in which Poor's Manual compiled these figures.

It should be noted that in the twenty years prior to 1893 the growth in "train-load" was probably not much more than about 40 tons, and this could clearly be accounted for almost entirely by the automatic effect of increasing business. It was only, as has been said, after the reorganization period of the nineties, when one-quarter of the railway mileage of the United States had passed through the courts, that "scientific railroading" began. The record of the sixteen or seventeen years since that time is eloquent of what has been accomplished.

Two things had to be done to increase the train-load—larger equipment had to be provided, roadbed being changed accordingly, both as to grade and strength, and better methods of handling business had to be put into effect. How much of the increase in load is due to each cannot be ascertained, but it is quite certain that better methods have done a large share of the work. For at least ten years all railway managers have been fully awake to the importance of saving train-mileage, and those familiar with railway management know how many and varied have been the efforts looking to this end. It may here be noted, moreover, that in the same period English railway managers have borrowed from and profited by our experience in this point, to the great advantage of shareholders. The Northeastern and the Lancashire & Yorkshire companies have been particularly successful in this respect.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Commissioner Prouty should have somewhat summarily dismissed Brandeis's contention in 1911. If there be a presumption in the facts as shown by the figures above quoted, it is hardly to the effect that there is any such "slack" in the business of railway transportation amenable to "scientific management" as his estimate of $300,000,000 annually would indicate. While it would probably be untrue to say that the railway managers have exhausted the possibilities of "management," it would probably be true to say that they have exploited them to a very large extent.

THE

Edited by WILBUR L. CROSS

Member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

A NEW AMERICAN QUARTERLY

The Yale Review is in no sense a technical or a local university magazine. It contains papers on subjects ranging from literature and current American politics to science and that rare thing in American letters, the intimate philosophic essay. Its articles on foreign affairs and literature are written by specialists who are both authoritative and interesting. All its writers have something to say and can say it in a way to command attention.

It has no "mission" and no dogmas, literary or political.

THE AUTHORITY FOR BOOK REVIEWS

The book reviews are one of its chief attractions. The purpose here is to print signed reviews of the best current books in all subjects of general interest. The more technical works are excluded. This section of the Yale Review is already attracting wide attention for its important and scholarly character, and its value to book buyers as the most authoritative literary department in American publishing.

The Development of American Nationality

By CARL RUSSELL FISH, Professor of American History, University of Wisconsin.

$2.25.

Exhibits American history as a development, and is not a mere narrative of events. The central point of view has been the political, with the idea that the American people have expressed themselves more fully in their political life than elsewhere. To make clear this political development, the various factors, economic, social, intellectual, and moral, which from time to time contributed to it, have been treated at the point where they become really influential.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1913.

The Week

Our American income-tax comes full seventy-one years after the imposition of the British tax in 1842. Sir Robert Peel turned to this expedient for raising revenue when he, too, was engaged in lowering the highest tariff from which England ever suffered, and wished to substitute direct for indirect taxation. The elaborate and unscientific British tariff of 1842 had come about, not like our own, as the result of deliberate manufacturing control of parties and legislation, but, as Mr. George Trevelyan points out in his new Life of John Bright, had "grown by men's negligence rather than been built up by their design." The heavy Whig duties on a thousand different articles had steadily produced deficits. But if the parallel is not exact here, we may at least hope that the consequences of Sir Robert Peel's radical revision—a vast expansion of England's foreign trade—will soon be duplicated in this country, now that the Underwood tariff is in force. Within four years, that is, by 1846, Peel was able to boast that "notwithstanding the hostile tariffs of foreign countries, the declared value of British exports has increased above ten million pounds." From the $285,000,000 of 1846 of which Peel was so proud, under the system of free trade, this same British export business had grown to $2,400,000,000 in 1912. Trade has greatly enlarged in protective countries, too, but the point is that it has gone on conquering under free trade in England, despite cocksure assertions that it could not.

The Progressive jubilations at Roosevelt's farewell dinner were scarcely marred by the fact that the Colonel's publicity agents gave out the wrong speech to the press. What though his followers knew that some one had blundered? Theirs not to reason why; theirs but to vote and die. It is undoubtedly inconvenient to have so many speeches on tap that a secretary mixes them up. Mr. Roosevelt explains that the passages attacking President Wilson and ex-President Taft, and showing how high a hand he himself would take with Mexico and South America, were intended for delivery on some other occasion. What occasion he does not specify. Presumably, not until after his return from South America. We know how forehanded he is, and it may be that the speech which unluckily leaked out is one that he had prepared for delivery when he lands at the Battery six months from now. As for what he said to the banqueters speeding him on his way, we think that the more critical among them might feel that he doth protest too much. He will "never" abandon them. He will fight to the last gasp for their sacred principles. But this would not be inconsistent with a purpose to carry them and their sacred principles, bag and baggage, over to the Republican party in 1916.

All these political speculations, with the unhappy controversies in which Mr. Roosevelt has been engaged, we believe that the great majority of his countrymen would like to drop into the ocean as they say good-by to him. They would prefer to think of him merely as an engaging and outstanding personality. His energy and versatility, his passion for activity, his gluttony for work, his varied and insatiate interest—these qualities of his continue to kindle general admiration. All Americans wish the Colonel well on his latest trip. Whether addressing universities or exploring tropic jungles, they feel sure that he will know the stern joy of a full life and will be an active and impressive figure to all who behold him.

Now it is the ever-faithful Jacob Riis who says that his beloved Colonel may be nominated by the Republicans in 1916. But this is, of course, on condition that the Republican party accept the Progressive principles. They must be "swallowed, neck and crop," declares Mr. Riis, or else Mr. Roosevelt will allow no Republicans to vote for him. To have to swallow the whole Progressive platform might seem like a large order. But parties know why a marciful Providence fashioned them holler. Even the Progressives may be capable of great feats in the swallowing lines. Their performance in bolting the whole protective tariff, after all their outcries against it, would show that they possess a vast hollow interior into which all kinds of queer things may be ingurgitated without filling it up.

It is no wonder that President Wilson feels concerned over the two serious breaches in the merit system which are now threatened as the result of Congressional action. One of them, while apparently affecting only the new appointees needed in connection with the just-instituted income tax, is in reality a menace to the entire classified service in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The Civil Service Reform League points out that this is brought about by a clause inserted in the tariff bill at a very late stage, the change apparently attracting no notice. The other attack on the merit system is the amendment which the Senate has tacked on to the Urgent Deficiency bill, taking deputy marshals and deputy collectors of internal revenue out of the classified service. The United States Civil Service Commission, so far from having recommended or endorsed this step, as at first reported in Washington dispatches, officially states that it "is opposed to any such action." It is in President Wilson's power to defend the merit system against both attacks. There is the more reason to hope that he will do so, because of the reported intention of Postmaster-General Burleson to urge, with his approval, the covering of the second-class and third-class postmasterships into the classified service. But Woodrow Wilson's antecedents ought to be, in themselves, sufficient guarantee that he will do his full duty in any question involving the integrity of the merit system.

In Tammany district-leader circles there is much uneasiness as to the effect of the Sulzer trial upon the municipal election in New York. The district leaders are only giving recognition to what is a matter of common knowledge. Pro-Sulzer sentiment is anti-Tammany sentiment, but without the impeachment such sentiment would not have crystallized. By Murphy's astute advisers this result must surely have been foreseen. What, therefore, can have been the motive that impelled Murphy to set the impeachment machinery in motion at such heavy risk to himself? One can hardly believe that Sulzer's efforts in behalf of the direct primary are sufficient explanation. Serious as the menace of a direct primary might be to the Tammany boss, it was a danger that could be faced and surmounted. It was not an immediate danger in point of time; whereas the Mayoralty election is close at hand. Nor is Tammany's disappointment over her failure to seize the Highways Department a sufficient reason. The venom and desperation that inspired Sulzer's impeachment seem best capable of explanation by the presence of a serious, immediate, personal danger, as if some of Tammany's hign servitors found themselves facing the fate of ex-Senator Stilwell. Then, too, it was natural for Tammany men to resent Sulzer's "going back on" them. They could stand attack by a "silk-stocking," but for one of their own kind to assume superior airs was too much.

A little more than a year ago, Pennsylvania Republicans held a Presidential primary in which the Flinn-Roosevelt adherents triumphed with a great noise. Now, with hardly a squeak, the Penrose element reassumes control. A political crime, you say, committed when honest men were in their beds. Not at all. The new State Committee, which last week elected an organization Republican as chairman, is the first to be chosen under the new direct primary law. The worst of it is that this blow at the Progressive party is only one of a series which began very soon after the defeat of last November. It is really too bad to lose the Keystone State, but as Mr. Munsey's Baltimore News confessed the other day about the chances in Maryland, moral victories are all that the party can expect just now. Anyway, what difference does it make in Pennsylvania? Is not the great issue the destruction of industry which the new tariff is sure to cause? And cannot Penrose voice the sentiment of a Pennsylvania Progressive upon this point as well as Flinn? The detailed analysis which he made in Washington of the injuries which are about to be inflicted upon his beloved State in the name of tariff reform would have the approval of every Republican faction in Pennsylvania. Touch the sacred edifice of protection, and the most advanced Progressive automatically becomes a standpatter.

Another attempt to get the people to rule has failed. By a "unique arrangement," any person attending the State Progressive Convention of Massachusetts on Monday was entitled to offer planks for the platform. There was to be no domination by the Committee on Resolutions. The wisdom of the humblest was to receive the same consideration as that of the most powerful. Yet what happened? Twelve amendments to the report of the Committee on Resolutions were presented, some of them by persons in the gallery who were not delegates. But in the end they were all voted down. What can be the explanation of so tragic an event? Surely no one will contend that there is more political virtue in a committee than in the whole body of the people. Nor can it be possible that a Progressive Convention would have more respect for a committee report than for a suggestion from the gallery. The thing is a mystery, and very unfortunate. It will be seized upon to confirm the unthinking in their respect for the pronouncements of small, carefully chosen bodies. What the country had a right to expect from the Massachusetts Progressives was the framing of a platform in open convention without the assistance of what Mr. Roosevelt a year ago was caustically terming "a small representative class."

One thing can be said in favor of the bill designating the first Sunday in June of each year as Fathers' Day: it does not create any new holidays. But is it really necessary to proclaim in so formal a fashion father's decline from his former high estate? Until our own era, his supremacy was taken as a matter of course. There was no Fathers' Day in Greece or Rome. The head of a household needed no rose in his buttonhole to tell him that he was what he was. Grant that his abuse of power justified the abdication which in our own time has been forced upon him; is it generous to compel him to label himself one day in every year? Why should he be dragged from that obscurity which was once the shelter of his wife and daughters into the fierce light that now beats upon them? It may very well be true that, as those behind the bill urge, he needs encouragement. But surely his spirit is not yet so broken as to make him welcome attentions more suited to the hospital than the counting-room. Besides, the wearing of a rose is now superfluous. The income-tax law will provide all the identification that the ordinary father will require.

A recent event in this city will doubtless revive talk about the folly of turning a boy loose in college with unlimited money at command. The curse of it and the temptation of it are obvious, and always have been. But a good deal, after all, depends upon the boy. Plenty of young fellows carry their wealth, as O'Connell hoped the noble lord would his liquor, easily. Nor are all undergraduate roisterers and profligates the scions of millionaires. Aping the habits of the gilded rich can be and is done on a very little money and very big debts. If the root of all evils could be dug out of college life, youth would still have its diseases to run through. And it would continue indifferent or incredulous under solemn preaching about the viciousness of vice. There might be a little hope of success, however, in a sensible man's trying to get it into the heads of reckless college boys that they are making a great mistake in their notion of "fun." It has been the saving of many an impetuous young man to discover that there is no fun in this world equal to doing good honest work and to preparing himself for it.

To Forbes-Robertson, the richly gifted interpreter of Hamlet, has come popular and official recognition as the greatest of living actors on the Anglo-Saxon stage. But it is not his Hamlet that has brought Forbes-Robertson the pecuniary success which enables him to announce his approaching retirement with a very handsome competency. This eminent actor might still be looking forward to a future of indefinite promise from the worldly point of view, if not for "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," a rather shoddy piece of dramaturgic art that probably would never have won the enormous popular success if the way to the public's heart had not been prepared by "The Servant in the House." It is a sign of the master that he does even the smallest thing well, and Forbes-Robertson invested the artificial and wooden rôle of The Stranger with poetic grace and dignity. Yet on the whole the world has probably lost more than it has gained by the years that our most eminent tragedian was compelled to spend away from his proper field.

Governor-General Harrison's entry upon his duties in the Philippines was signalized by a statement of the intentions of the United States towards the people of the islands which cannot have failed to give solid satisfaction to all sober and patriotic Filipinos. The outline of our programme of policy presented by Mr. Harrison conveyed the instructions of the Government at Washington. One definite step towards independence is distinctly announced, that of giving the native element a majority of the seats in the appointive Commission, the upper branch of the Legislature; and while the limitations imposed by the exercise of necessary caution are emphatically indicated, the pledge of ultimate independence is made more strongly than ever before. The words added by Mr. Harrison on his own account were admirable both in purpose and in expression. They recognized the completeness of our responsibility for the Philippine experiment, and the consequent necessity for "unremitting recognition of our sovereignty" while it is in the present formative stage; and at the same time they breathed a spirit of the most earnest hope that the people of the Philippines will give convincing evidence of their fitness to take over the government.

Dr. Stephen S. Wise, in the first of his lectures in this city on his experiences in the Holy Land, draws a very sombre picture of life among the Jewish population of Jerusalem. There is probably no exaggeration in the picture, but by leaving out of account the new phase of Jewish activity in Palestine, namely, that concerned with the development of a Jewish agricultural class, Dr. Wise may be in danger of giving a wrong impression of the general outlook in Palestine. Long before the Zionist movement took shape, there set in a heavy Jewish immigration towards the Holy City. The impulse was exclusively religious. The pilgrims were men and women beyond the prime of life who were actuated by the sole desire to spend their last years in the historic cradle of their race. For the most part, they came without capital and without assured means of support. The result has been such poverty and destitution as Dr. Wise describes. The other side of the picture is presented by the gratifying progress that has been made in the establishment of Jewish agricultural colonies, away from the large cities, under the auspices of various philanthropic agencies. According to competent observers, the degree of success attained in this direction is such as to insure the ultimate establishment of a Jewish population quite distinct from the Jewish community in Jerusalem.

Whatever may be Mr. Pindell's future in St. Petersburg, he leaves one record in Peoria that does him honor. "For twenty-five years," he declares, "I have been non-partisan in my support of judicial candidates, and I do not intend to change now." For the editor of a partisan newspaper, this attitude is notable. In the present instance, it is all the more so because it is maintained in the face of Gov. Dunne. A special election has been called in the Peoria district, at which a judge of the Illinois Supreme court is to be chosen. Despite Gov. Dunne's experience as a judge, and his knowledge of the unfortunate consequences that have followed the injection of partisanship into judicial elections, he has formally advised every Democrat and every Democratic newspaper in the district to support the Democratic nominee, although his opponent is being supported not only by independent voters, but by party men of the type of Mr. Pindell. It is to President Wilson's credit that he ignored the representations in this matter made to him by Mr. Pindell's enemies. What is needed is legislation that will take judicial nominations and elections out of politics. A bill to that end was defeated in the last session of the Legislature, partly by friends of Gov. Dunne.

The German Imperial Athletic Commission has come and seen and been conquered. Our skyscrapers are not more impressive than our athletes. Marvellous as were the stories about them that had reached the Old World, they did not tell half of the truth. What our visitors saw was a whole nation in training, inspired by athletic ambitions from the cradle to the grave. In sad contrast with this lively scene is the picture of still life which the Fatherland presents. Athletics of a sort are practiced, of course. The Turnverein is not a thing of yesterday, and the German army is not made up of men who do not know a dumb-bell from an Indian club. There are competitions, and those who excel in them are not without their reward. But how pale is all this beside the American way of doing it! No training table, apparatus in "some of our schools" only, no athletic instructor, no coach, no feverish forecasting of the outcome of to-morrow's contest between ancient rivals, no gigantic headlines in sporting pages reeking with figures and pictures. Is this the people, we ask in surprise, that "took" Alsace-Lorraine in six weeks and is the bogie of a nation so devoted to sport as England?

But such a question belongs to yesterday. From scorn and pity, the Old World is turning to admiration and emulation. Our famous coaches are taken over to wake up the youth of Europe and to organize victory upon this neglected battlefield. The name of Kraenzlein, a mighty one to conjure with, is now that of Germany's athletic field-marshal. For another Olympic contest approaches, and the United States cannot be allowed to win by virtual default. Neither national self-esteem nor international jealousy can stand in the way of submitting to the system that has brought the New World Power to the top of the athletic ladder. Sport for gentlemen was all very well once, but this is the twentieth century, in which sport is an activity for warriors. In this respect, Europe is to be made over according to plans drawn by America. Doubtless this is as it should be. Yet is there any reason why we should not take as well as give? While we are teaching Germany how to fight her way into and through the finals at Berlin in 1916, may we not develop an appreciation for a method of athletics that does not make most persons mere spectators? Our Rhodes scholars are greatly disturbed at seeing Oxford students performing various athletic feats in the absence of an audience. It strikes them as unnatural and a waste of energy. Would it really do us any harm to form the habit of walking and running and jumping with no organized cheering ringing in our ears, and without feeling the fate of empire resting upon us?

POLITICAL DISCOUNTING.

It is not only in Wall Street that future events are "discounted." We have just now an illustration of this in the enactment of a new tariff. Viewed in itself, viewed historically, viewed politically, this is an event of capital significance. We may be sure that it will bulk large in the political history of this year. Yet at the moment it passes almost unperceived. We have known for weeks that it was coming. It has come. So why bother about it? All Americans are like Metternich in this respect, that they say it is with to-morrow that their spirits wrestle. What takes place to-day is over and done with.

This gradual accustoming of the public to a great politico-economic change has its distinct advantages. It diminishes friction and avoids shock. If the bill which President Wilson signed had been suddenly imposed upon the country, as by imperial ukase, it would have caused acute excitement. But the six months of debate have got all the details fully and slowly before the public mind; to what is unusual in them people have become reconciled or, at least, habituated; and now all passes off quietly. The result had been so long and so thoroughly discounted that we are scarcely aware that its coming makes any difference. In this view of the matter, the long delays by the Senate, time-wasting and exasperating as they have often seemed, have not been without their compensating value. They have made it the simpler and the easier for the United States to glide from one tariff law to another.

It is obvious, however, that this familiarity with an epoch-making piece of legislation may tend to breed contempt. That is to say, in judging the end we incline to forget the means; in contemplating the triumph we are tempted to ignore the precedent struggle. The final passage of the tariff bill seemed ridiculously facile. The opposition fell down like a house of cards. It looked as if the whole appearance of a bitter and dubious contest was deceptive. And it may be that a great many careless Americans, observing the ease of the last stages, may be disposed to hold the achievement light. "Why," they will say, "anybody could have got the tariff through Congress. It was as easy as falling off a log."

In fact, however, as everybody who stops to think knows perfectly, it was tremendously hard. Incessant labor, unflagging vigilance, inflexible resolution were required in the making of the new tariff. It was no mock combat. The most powerful forces were aligned to bring about certain changes in the bill, or to defeat certain provisions of it, and somewhere there had to be the watchfulness and the determination to meet and defeat them. Where this resisting power, along with the dynamic driving force behind the bill, was placed, there is universal agreement. Both friends and enemies of the new tariff know that, but for the steady push and the unyielding purpose of the President, the bill could never have been passed in the form in which it finally became law. It was the college professor transferred to the White House who brought to bear upon Congress a conviction too clear and a will too strong to be withstood. And this is the event, so appealing in its personal bearings, so big with consequences to the nation, that we pass by almost without notice simply because it has been "discounted in advance"!

This, however, is but the feeling or the attitude of the passing day. The country is not really so indifferent as it pretends to be. In its heart, it is entirely aware of what has taken place. It knows that it stands to-day in the presence of a completed fiscal and political revolution. The people, as was maintained by Madame de Sévigné, are ni fou, ni sot; and we may be confident that they have a sufficiently just idea of the importance of the political history that is made under their very eyes. This does not mean that they will keep on talking about it. It is a wholesome instinct by which we drop the mastered task and pass on to the next lesson. But even if there are no public rejoicings over the first great achievement of the new Administration, we may rest assured that multitudes of Americans will glow with quiet satisfaction at this beginning of fulfilled pledges, and argue from it high hope as regards what remains to be done.

LABOR AND LAW.

The letters sent by Gov. Foss to officers of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Enginemen and Firemen, at New Haven, assert with unusual force and impressiveness the old doctrine of the limits which the community must insist upon setting to the right of railway employees to strike. Just in what way that limitation is to be enforced in the end, is a difficult question to decide; meanwhile the most has to be made of the appeal to the good sense of the railway workers on the one hand and to public opinion on the other. Gov. Foss first pointed out the tremendous stake that the public has in the question of a strike, irrespective of the causes leading to it, and he then proceeded to utter a few strong words on the merits of the contention which is supposed to furnish the chief reason for the strike proposal now under consideration by the Brotherhood. A strike on the New Haven system would mean "the stopping of the wheels of industry, loss of employment to hundreds of thousands of laborers, interference with the regular supply of food and fuel," and other public evils; and the Governor gives notice that if a strike is declared he will, with the assent of the Council, call a special session of the Legislature "for the purpose of enacting laws which, after providing effective remedies for all grievances of employees, shall absolutely prohibit strikes of railroad operatives employed within the Commonwealth."

The Governor is informed that the principal question at issue between the organizations and the company is "whether the promotion of employees and the assignment of duties shall be governed solely by the rule of seniority, or whether fitness as well as length of service shall be taken into consideration." It seems almost incredible, after the revelations connected with the series of disasters on the New Haven road, that the labor organizations should have the hardihood to demand that assignments shall be "governed solely by the rule of seniority." But if such be the fact, Gov. Foss is certainly justified in his straightforword words to the Brotherhood: "If you precipitate a strike upon the seniority issue, you will invite the condemnation of every fair-minded man in New England and the nation."

The matter has a broader bearing. Apart from any peculiar relation which the mechanism of transportation has to the public welfare and the public safety, the words last quoted suggest the question whether the state of opinion in this country, upon labor questions in general, has undergone any radical change in the past few years. To "invite the condemnation of every fair-minded man in the nation" used to convey to American ears a pretty definite significance. In one sense, it may be regarded as a question-begging expression. It may be objected that what you mean by a "fair-minded man" is a man who thinks as you think. But in reality, the implication of such a phrase rested on the assumption that in an overwhelming degree public sentiment in America upon labor questions was conservative sentiment, law-abiding sentiment; and the assumption was undoubtedly justified by the solid fact. In recent years, some doubt has been thrown upon the continuance of this state of things. From time to time there have been excitements, or upheavals, which have led many persons to believe that the American people are no longer unshakably attached to the preservation of law and order, to the assertion of the paramount rights of the commonwealth as against the claims of a class. The swift advance of the I. W. W. gave occasion for much talk of this nature; and the exposure of the widespread McNamara dynamite conspiracy gave rise to a remarkable outburst of semi-hysterical alarm, to which some persons, usually sober and responsible, lent countenance.

But we have just had a reminder of the subsidence of that state of mind. It is now nearly two years since the revelation of the dynamite conspiracy. At the time there arose a multitude of voices declaring that among the working people there had been going on a terrible change, of which the nation at large had been serenely unconscious. Unless cognizance were promptly taken of it, unless public policy were promptly adapted to the changed situation, revolutionary violence must go on increasing. The conflict of classes was at last before us, if it were not averted by extraordinary wisdom. Nevertheless, the law went quietly on its course. A year after the exposure, thirty-eight labor men connected with the plot, some of them men high in great labor organizations, were convicted by an Indianapolis jury. There was no outbreak of labor resentment. There was no excitement among the public at large. Neither the year between the exposure and the conviction, nor the period of nine months since the conviction, has been a time marked by labor violence. Such disturbances as there have been were chiefly from the I. W. W.; and the I. W. W. itself looks decidedly less formidable now than it did a year ago. As for the dynamite plot, a new chapter in its story was begun on Thursday of last week, with the arrest of one of the principal agents in it, who had hitherto escaped, and who has made a confession that will further lay bare its extent. Nobody is making, in connection with this, any fresh prophecies of the impending downfall of the existing order of society. On the contrary, the dynamite affair is going the way of the Molly Maguires affair, of the railway riots of 1877, of the affair of the Chicago Anarchists, of the great Chicago trouble in 1894. These things are not as new as some of our young sociologists imagine; and on the other hand the nation's attachment to the idea that progress must be achieved along safe and orderly lines is, we suspect, far more deeply rooted than they realize.

THE THREATENED NATIONAL PARK

What has been going on in regard to the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, during the present special session of Congress, is precisely the kind of thing that goes on whenever a public park, national or local, is threatened. Outwardly, the matter takes many shapes, but at heart the thing is always the same. Some purpose, often a purpose in itself highly meritorious, can be served at vastly less expense than it otherwise could be, by utilizing for it land that had been set aside for park purposes. In behalf of the park, it is protested that this land had been understood to be inviolable; that the very essence of the matter is that it must be so held, in the face of temptation to sacrifice it on the plea of economy; that such pleas are continually recurring, and that unless we set our faces firmly against them, the permanent preservation of our most precious parks is out of the question. In behalf of the park-destroying project, on the other hand, the plea is made that this particular scheme is exceptional; that the utilitarian advantage is enormous, and that the injury to the park is slight or else that the value of the park itself to the public is very small in comparison with the amount of the proposed gain. The defenders of the park are a few devoted enthusiasts, while their opponents are a large number of practical men, working hard and persistently for an end which—whether public or private—has the clear, tangible importance that is represented by hundreds of thousands, or millions, of dollars. Moreover, the aggressors have the comforting advantage that they need to win only once, and the game is over; whereas the defenders have to beat off the assault again and again. If the defenders win in the end, it is usually because, at some critical moment, when their case seems almost hopeless, a final rally is made, public attention is thoroughly aroused, and the scheme is at last set at rest.

Through a great part of this familiar course the attempt of San Francisco to get possession of the wonderful Hetch-Hetchy Valley has passed. Many as are the details which have been brought into the matter, the real question to-day is whether opportunity will be given for that last stand of the defenders to which they are justly entitled. The House committee has reported in favor of the San Francisco scheme, and the House has passed the bill. The Senate committee has also reported favorably. Only determined opposition in the Senate by those who realize the irrevocable character of the act proposed, or else a veto by the President, can save the valley. Even such action now could be regarded only as a stay of proceedings. The whole subject would doubtless come up again at the regular session of Congress, and in all probability would then be conclusively disposed of, one way or the other. And there is every reason why such a stay of proceedings should be had. It always takes a long time for the sentiment of the country on such an issue to assert itself. Even as it is, sentiment against the scheme has been widely and strongly asserted in the press. It is only on the plea of urgent necessity that there could be any excuse for passing the bill at this special session, called for the purpose of passing the tariff and currency bills, on which interest has been almost exclusively centred; and the plea of urgent necessity has altogether failed to be made out.

In fact, an examination of the report of the House committee—which has played the chief part in the history of the bill in the present Congress—shows that no serious attempt is made to establish any emergency reason for the bill. The report merely produces by vague and general statements the impression that San Francisco is in desperate need of getting water by the flooding of the Hetch-Hetchy Valley, while at the same time there are scattered all through it virtual admissions that the only reason for asking this concession from the nation is that it would save the city about $20,000,000. The "extracts from conclusions of Board of U. S. Army Engineers," to which the report gives special prominence, begin with this:

> The project proposed by the city of San Francisco, known as the Hetch-Hetchy project, is about $20,000,000 cheaper than any other feasible project for furnishing an adequate supply.

The spirit of the House committee's report may in some degree be inferred from a single brief passage:

> A people who undauntedly met the greatest disaster in all the world's history, and who rebuilt a devastated city, ought to be given sufficient consideration to enable them to select their own water supply and to ease the tax burden, which falls most heavily upon those who work for a living. The Hetch Hetchy question is not "a raid upon the Yosemite"; it is a question solely of providing pure water in ample supply to human beings.

The word we have put in italics was possibly a slip; but it was a very illuminating slip; and, furthermore, it is quite in keeping with the sentiment of the preceding sentence. If the people of San Francisco, on account of the losses they suffered from the earthquake and fire, have a right "to select their own water supply" and to "ease their tax burden," and if the ruin of a wonderful bit of natural scenery which the nation had set apart for preservation for all time is a consideration not pertinent to the case, of course there is nothing more to be said. But if the people of the United States cherish the policy of jealously guarding every such national possession; if they do not regard a little easing of the San Franciscans' "tax burden" as sufficient ground for departing from that policy; if they do not wish lightly to set a precedent which may return to plague them, which may endanger many another scene of beauty whose sacrifice is demanded upon similar pleas and with equal pertinacity; then there is no excuse for giving up the Hetch Hetchy unless a case is made out far stronger and far more convincing than that which has actually been presented.

THE UNIVERSITY AND THE STATE.

The serious illness of President Angell recalls not only the part he played at an important stage in the development of the University of Michigan, but the most interesting period in our whole educational history. He was one of four men who, born within the quinquennium from 1829 to 1834, were destined to assume positions of educational leadership just forty years later. The first of these to come to the front was Andrew D. White, who became the first president of Cornell in 1867. Charles W. Eliot was elected to the presidency of Harvard in 1869. James B. Angell exchanged the presidency of the University of Vermont for that of Michigan in 1871, and Daniel C. Gilman started Johns Hopkins upon its career in 1875. A certain similarity may be asserted of the work that lay before Presidents White and Gilman. Each of these men had the task of launching the institution which had called him to its service, different as the aims of Cornell and Johns Hopkins were and are. Presidents Eliot and Angell, on the other hand, had to do with established institutions, although there was a vast disparity of age between Harvard, with more than two centuries behind it, and the Western university, which could count a scant thirty years since its inception.

Age, however, was the least of the elements differentiating Michigan from Harvard; and the chief of these distinctions was true of Michigan as compared, not only with Harvard, but with either Cornell or Johns Hopkins. Every one of these Eastern universities was privately endowed; Michigan looked for its support to the State. However alike, therefore, might be some of the ideals which these four presidents set before themselves, the manner of their working out was bound to be radically affected for President Angell by this factor of State control. The new president must have congratulated himself, therefore, upon the condition of affairs which he found awaiting him at Ann Arbor. Under the influence of a few men who had had much to do with the University at its beginning, Michigan had been inspired to a considerable extent by German ideals of education. Indeed, in his "Reminiscences," President Angell goes so far as to say that the young institution "was shaped under broader and more generous views of university life than most of the Eastern colleges." It had happened, for example, that Isaac E. Crary was a member of the convention that framed the Constitution of 1835, and as Chairman of the Committee on Education drafted the article on that subject. Now, the famous report of Victor Cousin on public education in Prussia had fallen into the hands of the first Superintendent of Public Instruction in Michigan, who was a neighbor of Mr. Crary, and it formed the topic of much discussion between them. The result was the idea of a State system of schools with a university at its head.

But what, one asks, was bound to become of German educational ideals when they ran up against a set of American lawmakers? Strange as it may appear, in Michigan they lived to tell the tale. "I had occasion to visit the Legislature at several sessions," writes President Angell, "to make known to our committees, and sometimes to the whole body, our needs, and several times the whole Legislature visited the University. I wish to bear witness to the courtesy with which I was always received at Lansing, and the hearty interest in the institution which the members of the Legislature always evinced on their visits to us." He speaks even more explicitly of this relation, generally regarded as not a little hazardous for the institution involved:

> Eastern critics of the system of State support of universities have often assumed that the institutions would become embarrassed by being entangled in the controversies of party politics. It can be affirmed that such has never been the case in the support or control of this University. Different parties have been in control in this State during the life of the institution. But we have fared equally well, whichever party was in power, and no political controversy in the Legislature or in the State at large has ever embarrassed us.

Two years after he became president of Michigan, the friends of the University persuaded the Legislature to give it the proceeds of a twentieth-mill tax, in place of the special appropriations which had been the rule before. Later, this tax was raised to an eighth, and finally to three-eighths of a mill, and this method of providing funds for the State University has been followed by other Legislatures. This highly honorable course must have borne no small part in elevating the University of Michigan to the position it long held of the one Western institution of learning with a national reputation.

It is impossible to read what President Angell says about the connection between the University of Michigan and the people of Michigan without feeling that here is something that is still distinctively Western in our educational practice, and perhaps in our educational ideals as well. From Germany came the notion of receiving students from the high schools of the State on diploma instead of by examination. The high schools had first to be approved, and the visits of University professors to these schools on inspection trips were so many opportunities for suggesting improvements to the teachers, for fanning the flame of ambition in the students, and for deepening the concern of the public in education, both higher and lower. Towns and villages were spurred to a new interest in the school which the University authorities thought worthy of a visit. The University dominated the educational realm, but it did so without that struggle with the secondary schools which is one of the features of our time. The fear that the schools would not be courageous in maintaining the requirements set for them by the University proved unfounded. It is evident that to President Angell education was nothing if not an intensely human activity.

THE SUPERCOLLEGIATE COMMITTEE ON FRESHMEN.

Prof. Hugo Münsterberg: The meeting will please come to order. We are now in the first week of October. This fact, which the ordinary citizen has probably accepted without question, has been amply confirmed in an elaborate series of laboratory tests carried on by means of white and yellow cards and rapidly revolving disks. Thus we are prepared to discuss once more the highly interesting question, why the vast majority of freshmen cannot spell. Neither can they write their native tongue in accordance with the rules of grammar.

Prof. T. R. Lounsbury: Aw, gee! Why should they? Look at Chaucer, Milton, and Browning. The fiercest bunch of little spellers you ever saw. And their grammar is simply rotten. They didn't care a red cent for the grammarians. When they saw a word or a phrase they liked they went to it. If the grammarians didn't agree with them it was up to the grammarians. Chaucer should worry.

Dr. Woods Hutchinson: Quite right.

Professor Lounsbury: The question is just this: Are freshmen made for the English language or is language made for freshmen? Language is like a human being: change does it good. Stick to your Lindley Murray and it's a cinch your little old English tongue will be a dead one in fifty years.

Dr. Hutchinson: I agree with Professor Lounsbury, speaking from the standpoint of physiology. Constant use of a plural verb with a plural subject plays the deuce with the larynx. You know what the larynx is, gentlemen. It's a rubber disk in the human Victrola. Drop the pin on the rubber disk and the record will grind out the same formula, again and again. Keep it up long enough and the record wears out. That's the larynx under the operation of grammatical rules. It gets the habit, and the first law of health is to avoid all habits. What you want to do is to shake up the larynx by feeding it with new forms of expression. When a man says "I done it," it imparts a healthy jolt to the delicate muscles of the throat, limbers up his aorta and his diaphragm, and reconciles him with his digestion. This is the opinion of eminent physiologists, like Drinckheimer of Leipzig.

Professor Lounsbury: Whom did you say the man is?

Dr. Hutchinson: Drinckheimer, professor at Leipzig. He doesn't write for the magazines.

Professor Lounsbury: Then you will agree with me that when a man has something to say he will say it?

Professor Münsterberg: We have an excellent illustration on this point in a history paper submitted in the last entrance examinations. In reply to the question, "Name the first two Presidents of the United States," one candidate wrote, "The first president was Gorge Washington; his predeceassor was Alexander Hamilton." Observe the extraordinary psychological correlation between thought and expression in such a reply.

Prof. A. B. Hart: I don't think the young man was guilty of an injustice with regard to Alexander Hamilton. You will recall that Hamilton was one of the principal founders of the system of privilege which has produced, in our own day, Lorimerism and the purchase of Southern delegates. If it had not been for Hamilton and his crowd we should not now be compelled to wage a campaign for social justice and I should not be under the necessity of writing Bull Moose history for Collier's.

Dr. Hutchinson: But getting back to the real point of our inquiry, whether the failure to spell and write correctly is a sign of mental feebleness——

Professor Münsterberg: On that point I believe I can speak with authority. Psychological tests in the laboratory show that the average freshman is as quick-witted to-day as his predecessor of fifty or a hundred years ago. We examined three hundred first-year men from eleven colleges and universities. Each man was required to peep into a dark box, shaped like a camera, through an eye-hole sixteen millimetres in diameter. By pressing a button, light was flashed upon a slip of paper inside the box, on which was printed, in letters nine millimetres high, the following question: "What is your favorite breakfast food?" The candidate was required to signify his answer by tapping with his finger on the table, one tap for Farinetta, two taps for Dried Husks, three taps for Atlas Crumbs, and so forth. The average time for three hundred answers was six and seven-tenths seconds. Thereupon the candidates were asked to think over the question at their leisure and to hand in a written answer sworn to before a notary public. On comparing the written answers with the laboratory results, it appeared that only thirty-seven out of the three hundred had tapped the wrong answer. Need I say more?

Professor Lounsbury: May I ask how the written answers showed up from the point of view of spelling and grammar?

Professor Münsterberg: They were impressively defective.

Professor Lounsbury: I'm tickled to death. When you cut out bad spelling and grammar, you queer the evolution of the English language. There's nothing to it.

Professor Münsterberg: But take the case of the freshman squad whom we kept in an hermetically sealed room for twenty-four hours in a temperature of 89 degrees——

Professor Lounsbury: May I ask what their language was when they were released at the end of twenty-four hours?

Professor Münsterberg: Truth compels me to say it was something awful.

Professor Lounsbury: But how about the grammar?

Professor Münsterberg: There was no grammar to speak of. They used mostly interjections.

Dr. Hutchinson: Finest thing in the world, interjections. Good for the lungs and the heart. Rapid succession of inhalation and expulsion keeps the bellows in prime order. That's all a man is, gentlemen, a bellows on a pair of stilts driven by a hydraulic pump. If the bellows holds out under sudden strain, that's all you want. That's why I like to hear people swear. It's good for the wind. Next time you walk down a step too many in the dark or lose your hat under a motor truck, don't hold yourself back. It's the way nature is safeguarding you against asthma.

Professor Münsterberg: Then it is the consensus of opinion here that the psychological and cultural status of our college freshmen is everything it ought to be?

Professor Hart: I'd rather take the opinion of a roomful of freshmen on any subject than the opinion of the United States Supreme Court. They don't know anything about American history, but it's the kind of history that isn't worth knowing. I prefer them to know things as they ought to have been rather than as they were before the Progressive party was born. Whatever is worth preserving from the past, including the Decalogue, will be found in the Bull Moose platform. We don't want examination papers. We want social justice.

Professor Lounsbury: Between you and I, the English language won't get what's coming to it until all entrance examinations and all other kinds have been chucked into the discard.

Dr. Hutchinson: Spelling is demonstrably bad for the muscles of the chest and the abdomen.

Professor Lounsbury: You've said it.

THE BICENTENARY OF DIDEROT.

The distinction of Diderot, the bicentenary of whose birth falls this week (October 5), is to be a universal precursor of modern life. More perhaps than any other man of the eighteenth century except Rousseau, he deserves to be accounted, in Amiel's phrase, an ancestor in all things. "The age," he wrote to Grimm in 1765, "always ends by coming around to my taste and point of view. . . . Do not laugh: it is I who anticipate the future and know its thought." Now most of the revolutionary changes that have taken place from Diderot's time to ours rest, in the final analysis, on a re-interpretation of the word nature; and Diderot was successful in anticipating the future because he was so thoroughgoing a naturalist. In the "Supplément au voyage de Bougainville" he paints a picture of primitive life which is very close to Rousseau in its emphasis on man's native goodness, if not in the more than Rabelaisian crudity of certain details. But he was not, like Rousseau, an obscurantist; he would maintain the intellect in its rights if only in the interests of the investigator. Here is a chief reason why Goethe had a veritable cult for Diderot long after he had repudiated Rousseau. It is characteristic of the history of Diderot's writings that his masterpiece, the "Neveu de Rameau," became known in France only through a retranslation of Goethe's translation more than fifty years (1821) after its probable date of composition. The more significant relationship between Diderot and Goethe appears, however, in a work like the latter's "Metamorphosis of Plants." For Diderot is most original as a scientific naturalist, especially in his anticipations of evolution. Some of these anticipations were so bold that, so far from printing them, he ventured to represent them only as muttered by D'Alembert in the course of a feverish dream. What we find in the "Rêve de D'Alembert" (published in 1830) is, in addition to the cell theory, virtually all the essential hypotheses of the modern evolutionist. Nature is conceived by Diderot as a perpetual flux in which the higher forms of being develop by almost insensible gradations from the lower. "Every animal is more or less man; every mineral is more or less plant; every plant is more or less animal. There is nothing precise in nature." He foreshadows Darwin, not only in his hypotheses, but in his perception of the subordinate place of hypothesis in true science. He narrates a curious vision in which the rôle of experiment is revealed to him as opposed to mere theory. Experiment appears to him first in the form of a child; but as the child advances his limbs swell until he becomes an enormous colossus, and at his touch the air-hung Temple of Metaphysics falls with a crash—and Diderot awakes.

I.

In a passage of this kind Diderot speaks in the spirit of the English positivists and utilitarians, and, indeed, however un-English he may appear in his personal quality, he is more than almost any other French writer of his time a disciple of the English, from Bacon to the contemporary sentimentalists.* "Jacques le Fataliste," for example, is at once a pastiche of Sterne and a proclamation of scientific naturalism. We can, in fact, see in Diderot as perhaps nowhere else the interplay and deep underlying connection between the scientific and emotional aspects of the naturalistic movement. Conceiving nature as a pure flux, he proceeds, like the ancient sophists, to transfer this conception from the physical to the human plane. "The first vow," he exclaims, "taken by two mortal beings was at the foot of a rock that was crumbling into dust; as witness to their constancy they called upon a sky that is not for an instant the same; everything was passing within them and about them, and they thought their hearts immune from these vicissitudes," etc. As versified by Alfred de Musset, this passage became a favorite romantic theme:

Oui, les premiers baisers, oui, les premiers serments
Que deux êtres mortels échangèrent sur terre,
Ce fut au pied d'un arbre effeuillé par les vents,
Sur un roc en poussière. . . .

We are thus constantly reminded in Diderot how much romanticists have in common with so-called realists and scientific evolutionists, especially in their relation to the traditional disciplines, whether classical or Christian. All the specifically modern uses of the word nature are in germ in the following passage from the "Supplément au voyage de Bougainville":

> Do you wish to know in brief the tale of almost all our woe? There once existed a natural man; there has been introduced within this man an artificial man, and there has arisen in the cave a civil war which lasts throughout life.

Everything, then, that restrains "nature" is to be dismissed as empty convention. Above all, there is to be no restraint on the most imperious of the instincts, that of sex. To the idyllic picture of the emancipation of this instinct in the "Supplément" corresponds the violent diatribe against the putting of restraint upon it in "La Religieuse." "What they call evangelical perfection," Diderot complains, "is only the fatal art of repressing nature." Diderot would therefore turn away from the "war in the cave," that is, the struggle between good and evil in the breast of the individual, and fix his attention on the progress of mankind as a whole in knowledge and sympathy. On the positive side, as an expression of the Baconian and utilitarian ideal, the "Encyclopédie" derives from England. Yet contemporaries, who knew Diderot almost exclusively as editor of the "Encyclopédie," were right in feeling that the significance of the work is more negative than positive—it is a huge battering ram levelled at all the citadels of traditional authority. "This work," he writes to Mademoiselle Volland, "will surely produce in time a revolution in men's minds, and I hope that tyrants, oppressors, fanatics, and bigots will not gain thereby."

In general, Diderot's work has more unity on the negative than on the positive and constructive side. He is less a man of fixed principles than an impressionist. He is very "natural" in his own sense, that is, very temperamental. He is a native of Langres, he explains, and the head of a Langrois is set on his body like a weather-vane on a steeple (a mobility that Diderot refers in turn to the climate): "I had in a day a hundred different physiognomies, according to the circumstance by which I was affected. I was calm, sad, dreamy, tender, violent, passionate, enthusiastic," etc. He is so little capable of dominating and unifying his impressions, so little capable, in short, of composition, that he can scarcely be said to be a writer at all; he is rather, in Sainte-Beuve's phrase, the Homer of journalists. His collected works are a vast and confused improvisation. Though he has little true dramatic sense, his favorite literary form is the dialogue, and this is perhaps because he already inclines, like Renan, to set "the two lobes of his brain to conversing with each other." Some of his writings seem to proceed from the opposite poles of human thought. In general, his conception of genius is thoroughly romantic: the genius is the man who cannot control himself, and who aspires to stormy emancipation from neo-classical smugness. "Poetry," he says, "calls for something enormous, barbaric, and savage"; and he continues in a remarkable forecast of the actual relation between the romantic movement and the Revolution:

> When shall we see poets again? It will be after times of disaster and great misfortune; when the harassed nations begin to breathe once more. Then imaginations, shaken by terrible spectacles, will picture things unknown to those who have not witnessed them.

But in the "Paradoxe sur le comédien" he opposes to the central romantic doctrine of spontaneity, of free effusion, the no less central classical doctrine of imitation. Diderot, the most temperamental of men, living, in his own phrase, at the mercy of his diaphragm, is opposed to temperamental acting.* The actor is not to be an emotionalist, but a cool observer, who works out with the aid of his intellect and judgment a model and then imitates it. Above all, he must

*A very complete and careful study of this English influence has just appeared: Diderot as a Disciple of English Thought, by R. Loyalty Cru. New York: Columbia University Press.

*Diderot was greatly influenced in his ideas about acting, as Dr. Cru points out, by his conversations with Garrick.

avoid feeling his rôle while acting it. The "Paradoxe sur le comédien" was published in 1830, only a few years before Musset's "Stances à la Malibran." Musset takes the position one would have expected Diderot to anticipate. La Malibran is extolled because she so superabounded in "soul" in the romantic sense, and shed real tears upon the stage. This emotional facility, says Diderot, is a sign not of genius, but of mediocrity. "I am making no ordinary confession," he adds, "for if Nature ever fashioned an emotional soul, it is my own."

Diderot is, indeed, a perfect example of l'âme sensible, the lachrymose and declamatory precursor of the true romanticist. A man would be ashamed, says La Bruyère, to display his feelings at the theatre. In Diderot's time he would have been ashamed not to display them; for in the meantime the great discovery had been made that man is naturally good and that the proper way for this goodness to manifest itself is to overflow through the eyes. It had become almost a requirement of good manners to weep and sob in public. At the performance of the "Père de Famille," in 1769, we are told that every handkerchief was in use. The Revolution seems to have raised doubts as to the necessary connection between tearfulness and goodness. The "Père de Famille" was hissed from the stage in 1811. Geoffroy commented in his feuilleton: "We have learned by a fatal experience that forty years of declamation and fustian about sensibility, humanity, and benevolence have served only to prepare men's hearts for the last excesses of barbarism."

As to the dulness and badness of Diderot's actual plays, all are agreed. There is somewhat less agreement regarding the value and influence of the dramatic theories with which he accompanied them. His plea for the middle-class drama, his attack on the notion that only persons of a certain social rank had a right to be taken seriously on the stage, whereas others were to be relegated to comedy and farce, was part of a world movement that would probably have triumphed without him. The more original parts of his dramatic theory illustrate interestingly, at least, his attempt to get rid of the "war in the cave"—in other words, his naturalistic denial of dualism. Instead of character he would put upon the stage professions or callings. Man is to be exhibited not as determining himself but as determined by his social rôle and environment—a conception realized, if at all, not in the drama, but in the "Comédie humaine" of Balzac. For the subtle shadings of speech that the great dramatists have needed to set forth the inner struggle of motives, he would substitute, so far as possible, pantomime, and for true dramatic action he would give us a series of stage pictures (what he calls a décoration animée), so combined as to preach a moral of general social utility. A highly melodramatic problem play done in moving pictures would seem to come very near satisfying all his requirements.

II.

Diderot's notion of the drama, it has been objected, is too pictorial; his notion of painting, on the other hand, is too literary and dramatic. In his attack on the older or pseudo-classic confusion of the arts, based on the maxim ut pictura poesis, he furnished pregnant hints to Lessing; at the same time he prepares the way for our modern confusions arising from an emotionalism that overflows all barriers.

Opinions diverge even more widely regarding his "Salons" than regarding his dramatic theories, some looking upon him as the inventor, others as the corrupter, of the true criticism of art. As to the reproach that he sees in painting a sort of transposed literature, that he is less interested in the execution than in the subject or story, the obvious reply is that it would have been hard for him to see more literary intentions in the pictures of the time than the artists were themselves striving to put there. After all, a work of art should be something more than a triumph of technique. It should have an adequate human purpose. The true reproach to bring against Diderot is not that he put primary emphasis upon the subject, but that his conception of the subject should be satisfied by the "Mauvais Fils puni" of Greuze. Here again his weakness can be traced to his denial of dualism, and the consequent substitution of emotionalism for insight. He fails to temper the mere keenness of his relish, his infinite zest, with judgment, an inner mediation that is, after all, only one aspect of the "war in the cave." And so he has gusto rather than taste. His gusto usually shows itself in the warmth of his appreciation, and not, as often in the case of Hazlitt, for example, in the violence of his antipathies. "I am naturally inclined to neglect faults and to grow enthusiastic over virtues. . . . If there is a fine feature in a book, a character, a picture, a statue, it is on that my eyes rest: I see and remember only that; the rest is almost forgotten." He is plainly a forerunner of the "creative" critic in the neo-romantic sense, of the man who narrates the adventures of his "soul" in the presence of masterpieces. The rôle of the artist is to be reduced to expressing the reaction of his temperament to any outer stimulus; and the rôle of the critic in turn to telling how his temperament is affected by this expression. What is eliminated in both cases is that element in human nature which acts as a check upon temperament.

III.

The main problem, according to the older school, is not the mere expressing, but the humanizing of temperament. You must set up before you, this school maintained, an image of normal human nature, and then accept the curb on temperamental impulse imposed by the imitation of this model. The result of this restraint upon temperament is decorum. The process by which this great central doctrine of classicism degenerated into mere artificiality, by which decorum became identified with the usages of polite society or with academic routine, is well known. Diderot's rôle in the revolt against this artificial decorum is perhaps second only to that of Rousseau. I have already said something about his attack on artificial decorum in the drama. "Ah! bienséances cruelles, que vous rendez les ouvrages décents et petits." There was an almost ludicrous opposition between the exuberance of Diderot's temperament and the limits imposed by decorum either true or artificial. Catherine the Great wrote to Madame Geoffrin that she was black and blue as the result of the slappings Diderot had given her in their interviews, and that she had had to interpose a table to protect herself from the violence of his gesticulations.

Critics are wont to praise Diderot for his flashes of divination, his genial intuitions: and this praise is deserved so far as his intuitions of physical law are concerned. On the other hand, he is radically lacking in perception of the human law and in the fine tact and sense of measure that arise from this perception. He is an extraordinarily complete type of the pure expansionist, of the man who lives in a "wide-open universe." The total effect of his personality is that of excess, of an unrestrained riot of intellect and emotion, of what the French would call une verve endiablée. "He appears natural only when exaggerated," said Madame Necker of him. "Ideas that have got drunk and taken to running after one another" is a description of his theories by another contemporary. He often seems, however, far madder than he is, being in this respect the exact opposite of Rousseau. His works remind us only too frequently that decorum and decency are very nearly related, and that the words were indeed long synonymous. The work in which he has the memorable Baconian vision I have already cited, is not merely indecent, but criminally indecent; it is mildly described by Diderot himself as the "pestilential exhalation of a sewer." A Platonic gleam may rest upon his brow, says Sainte-Beuve, but look more closely and you will always see the satyr's hoof. "He equalled Bacon and Aretino," is the doubtful compliment of a contemporary couplet.

To his absence of decorum he owes largely what is in the eyes of many the chief of literary virtues—an amazing frankness of self-revelation. Any one who has been through his writings, from his "Regrets on His Old Dressing-Gown" to the Letters to Mademoiselle Volland, will scarcely complain of any lack of intimate contact with the author.

An age like our own in which not merely ordinary mortals, but Secretaries of State and Presidents, have dispensed with decorum, and which, to judge by certain recent symptoms, is preparing to dispense with decency, should certainly recognize in Diderot one of its ancestors. Yet, after all, decorum is, in Milton's phrase, the grand masterpiece to observe. If the world ever works its way out of the present naturalistic imbroglio, the discarding of true along with conventional decorum may be seen to be about the worst instance on record (if I may be allowed the familiar phrase) of "pouring out the baby with the bath." To miss decorum is to become incapable of what is best in art and literature (not to speak of life itself); it is to lose the secret of selection and the grand manner. Diderot's weakness in this respect already foreshadows the latest predicament into which art has fallen—its helpless oscillations between a photographic literalness and incomprehensible attempts to symbolize purely personal emotion. To be sure, Diderot can on occasion say admirable things on the grand manner, as he can say admirable things on almost any other topic. He knew his classics and has written pages on Terence (in whom he saw a sort of ancestor of the drame bourgeois) which are justly celebrated. Yet we may question the high seriousness of a critic who calls upon the centuries to pass more swiftly, in order that they may bring with them the honors due to Richardson, and in the meanwhile puts Richardson on the same shelf with Homer; and who exalts Lillo, author of "The London Merchant," to the side of Sophocles. We should feel sure, even without the "Plan for a University" which he submitted to the Empress Catherine, that he had no true conception of the rôle of the humanities in education, and that the total tendency of his mind is flatly utilitarian.

IV.

Diderot, speaking as an eighteenth-century sentimentalist, would have us believe that men have only to return to nature, that is, to live temperamentally, to become denizens of Arcadia; but in at least one of his works, the "Neveu de Rameau," the Arcadian mist is dissipated and the actual state of nature is seen to be the struggle for life. To cast off all the laws and usages of the society in which one lives as mere conventions and obey only the promptings of temperament, is in reality to be a Bohemian; and Rameau's nephew is not merely a Bohemian, but also, in intention at least, a beast of prey. Life as he sees it is a universal scramble for power and pleasure. The prizes go to the strong and cunning, and the fools and weaklings pay for all the rest. Rationalism has undermined the traditional foundations of society, and is impotent to put anything in their place. Perhaps in no other work of the eighteenth century can one hear so plainly as in the "Neveu de Rameau" the sinister crackings of an edifice that is about to come down on the heads of its occupants.

The view of life set forth by Rameau's nephew is already that of Rastignac and other similar figures in Balzac. It is no accident that the generation which worshipped Balzac also most exalted Diderot; the generation, namely, which became active about the middle of the nineteenth century and which called itself, in opposition to the previous romantic generation, realistic; which looked up to Taine as its representative thinker and found its extreme expression, not to say its caricature, in the novels of Zola. Diderot more than anticipates Taine and the determinists when he proclaims that "there is no liberty, no action that deserves praise or blame, there is neither vice nor virtue, nothing that should be rewarded or punished. . . . There is only one sort of causes, to speak properly—physical causes." Does this attempt to reduce life to the usufruct of an aggregation of molecules, as one of the school expressed it, deserve to be called realism? Diderot's method of dealing with material nature is undoubtedly realistic; and in so far he is worthy of all praise. How about human nature? The Empress Catherine, whose knowledge of human nature, it will be generally granted, was real, so far as it went, concluded, after almost daily interviews with Diderot for several months, that he was not a realist, but a dreamer, a man whose imagination ran away with his sense of fact, and therefore in his notions of practical matters a utopist. To be able to judge correctly the persons one meets in everyday life would seem to be a fair test of the realist; and this Diderot was notoriously incapable of doing. A certain imaginative deformation of reality is visible in nearly all the works of the school. Balzac's Paris, for example, is not real, but a lurid dream, the rather peculiar type of Arcadia projected by an imagination that is flying off at a tangent from reality. As Leslie Stephen put it, Paris, according to Balzac, is hell; but, then, hell is the only place worth living in. Zola's peasants, again, are not real; they are naturalistic nightmares. We should be careful not to bestow lightly the noble name of realist.

This whole dispute as to what is a real rendering of human nature reduces itself at last to a single question: Is the "war in the cave" artificial, after all? Suppose it be true, as the humanist asserts, that deep down in the breast of the individual man, far more primary and immediate than either thought or feeling, is a power of control over thought and feeling, a something that may be defined experimentally as the back pull towards the centre. In that case, the "war in the cave," so far from being artificial, the mere prejudice of outworn dogmatisms, is a fact of formidable import. To deny this fact in the name of "nature" is to be guilty of a monstrous mutilation of human nature. Hope for the future may lie in the man who will plant himself resolutely on this fact and refuse to be drawn away from it into some phantasmagoria of the intellect or emotions; who will submit to a stern scrutiny from the point of view of this fact the fluent assumptions of both scientific and sentimental naturalists; who will deal with the "law for man" even as the Baconian has dealt with the "law for thing," and look with at least equal disdain on the apriorist and the builder of systems; who will take issue with the men of science, not because they are hardheaded, but because they are not hardheaded enough; whose complaint of the positivists will be that they are not sufficiently positive; who will be ready, in short, to react in the name of the modern spirit against the great expansive movement of the past century, of which Diderot is rightly held to be the universal precursor.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

One of the methods by which England endeavored to regain her control of the American colonies was by the establishment of an English bishop in America, who should unite factions and fill the pulpits. The clergymen, in turn, were to exert a powerful influence for submission on their congregations. On October 13 a complete collection of pamphlets embodying this American Episcopate Controversy will appear at auction at the Anderson Galleries.

The first of the series, "A Sermon Preached before the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; at their Anniversary Meeting," aroused an excitement in America which was out of all proportion to the importance of the project. The idea was not original, and had been mooted for a generation or two without provoking a ripple in American politics. But the psychological moment had arrived when any movement that tended to increase the power of England in the colonies would be fought with vigor and persistency. John Adams, writing in 1815, says:

> The apprehension of Episcopacy contributed fifty years ago, as much as any other cause, to arouse the attention, not only of the inquiring mind, but of the common people, and urge them to close thinking on the constitutional authority of Parliament over the colonies. . . . The objection was not merely to the office of a bishop, though even that was dreaded, but to the authority of Parliament, on which it must be founded.

The Bishop of Landaff's sermon at once provoked a spirited reply from Dr. Charles Chauncy, of Boston, entitled: "Dr. Chauncy's Remarks on certain Passages in the Bishop of Landaff's Society-Sermon. . . . In which the highest Reproach is undeservedly cast upon the American Colonies. Boston, 1767." In these "Remarks" the author writes:

It may be relied on, our people would not be easy, if restrained in the exercise of that "liberty wherewith Christ has made them free"; yea, they would hazard everything dear to them, their estates, their very lives, rather than suffer their necks to be put under that yoke of bondage which was so sadly galling to their forefathers, and occasioned their retreat to this distant land that they might enjoy the freedom of men and Christians.

Dr. Thomas Bradbury Chandler, Rector of St. John's Church, in Elizabethtown, N. J., at the request of a Convention of the Clergy of New York and New Jersey, then proceeded, in "An Appeal to the Public in Behalf of the Church of England in America," to urge the claims of the loyal clergymen in this country. By William Livingston, of New York, was issued "A Letter to the Right Reverend Father in God, John, Lord Bishop of Landaff; Occasioned by Some Passages in his Lordship's Sermon . . . in which the American Colonies are loaded with great and undeserved Reproach." Mr. Livingston objected to the aspersions on the colonists as having "abandoned their native manners and religion," and pointed to the laws of New England, which required lands to be set apart in every new township for the erection of churches. He claimed a more general observance of the Sabbath in America than in London, and shrank from any further manifestation of England's power, political or ecclesiastical, in the colonies. Dr. Chandler reissued his pamphlet and added a Supplement, replying to Dr. Chauncy. This Supplement has also been attributed to the Rev. Caleb Fleming.

Perhaps the most interesting, bibliographically, of these controversial pamphlets, is "A Vindication of the Bishop of Landaff's Sermon from the gross Misrepresentations and Abusive Reflections, contained in Mr. William Livingston's Letter to his Lordship: With some Additional Observations on certain Passages in Dr. Chauncy's Remarks. By a Lover of Truth and Decency." One bibliographer, only, appears to have discovered the author of this work, but a contemporary life of Samuel Johnson, by Mr. Chandler, states that it was by the Rev. Charles Inglis, rector of Trinity Church, New York. Three issues with slight variations appeared in 1768, but it is impossible to determine which was the earliest.

After another epistle from the pen of Dr. Chauncy in reply to Mr. Chandler, an anonymous publication by "Anti-Episcopalian" argued against the dangers of an encroachment on American liberties by American bishops; and Micajah Towgood wrote "A Dissent from the Church of England Fully Justified." Then followed a whole collection of Tracts by William Livingston and others, which so perturbed the loyal ministers that Dr. Smith, of Philadelphia, wrote to the Bishop of London: "The addresses of the Jersey Convention and Dr. Chandler's appeal about bishops for America, tho' in the main well done, have raised a great Flame. There is nothing but writing in every newspaper—The Church here is now very rudely treated by a malevolent set of Writers and tho' I could have wished our side had not given any cause yet they must not be left unsupported, and I am determined now to contribute my mite for great openings are given to detect their shameful misrepresentations." Early in 1769, Mr. Chandler and Dr. Chauncy again exchanged arguments expressing still more rancor and heat, and in the same year a letter from Thomas Secker, Bishop of Oxford, from Horace Walpole, was unearthed, and printed in support of the loyal clergyman. This occasioned a critical commentary by Francis Blackburne, with its inevitable reply from Mr. Chandler.

The controversy reached its climax in 1771, when Myles Cooper wrote "An Address from the Clergy in New York and New Jersey to the Episcopalians in Virginia; Occasioned by some late transactions in that Colony Relative to an American Episcopate." It was suggested by the action of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, by whom it was, "Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That the thanks of this House be given to the Reverend Mr. Henley, the Reverend Mr. Gwatkin, the Reverend Mr. Hewitt, and the Reverend Mr. Bland, of the wise and well-timed Opposition they have made to the pernicious project of a few mistaken Clergymen, for introducing an American Bishop: a Measure, by which much Disturbance, great Anxiety, and Apprehension, would certainly take Place among his Majesty's faithful American Subjects."

To Mr. Cooper, Thomas Gwatkin replied in 1772, and after one or two desultory attempts by Mr. Chandler, the controversy was brought to a close by the absolute refusal of the colonists to accept of anything English, except on their own terms.

Correspondence

A LITERARY AFFECTATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Recently I have encountered several productions of a popular writer in periodicals rather outside my usual field of reading. They attracted my attention and led me on, until presently I began to feel a certain dragging sensation. The cause was not at first apparent. The characters were interesting, if rather repellent; there was plenty of the "action" so strenuously demanded by constituencies of the baser sort, and the dialogue had a sparkle, even if it was somewhat hard and metallic in its glitter.

It was in the dialogue that the drag was most felt, and further analysis discovered the cause. In one short passage I met these expressions:

"Need any help?" husked A.
"They're our best revenue," defended B.
"Still your jolly self," greeted C.
"It's a wonder they don't square themselves," chatted D.

In another of the stories are these choice bits:

"I know his kind," fondly remembered E.
"Why shouldn't he?" scorned F.
"It's a lie!" perfunctorily denied G.

And these in still another:

"Very thoughtful of you," dryly thanked H.
"He can win her love," she faintly surrendered.

These are but a few of a host of expressions which grated on my mental ear and distracted attention from the story itself. "A husked." Why husked? Does the word contain some recondite allusion to the old-time barn and bee and red ear and pretty girl? Or does it mean that A was a "husky" person and spoke in a loud tone of voice? Or can it be an abortive attempt to intimate that his voice was hoarse? If so, why not say "hoarsed A"?

After a careful examination, I believe I have reached the true diagnosis. The trouble of this writer and those like him is an acute case of logophobia. They dread the sight of the good old word "said" as a hydrophobic patient dreads water. But why? It is an eminently useful and even respectable word, one which our best authors have not feared nor disdained to employ, and employ freely. Taking down a volume of Thackeray, for instance, and opening it at random, I note that he does, indeed, use synonyms — "says," "cries," "shouts," "remarks," "continues," "bawls," "asks," etc.—all of which, fairly implying, as they do, the idea of saying, are perfectly legitimate. But he does not deal in such monstrosities as are quoted above. Indeed, he is not above writing "said" with half a dozen speeches in succession. Furthermore, in Scott's "Ivanhoe" we meet "said" eight or even nine times on a single page, and in Hall Caine's "Manxman" it occurs eleven times in twelve successive speeches. Nor is Jane Austen more timid in employing the simple word from which this writer shrinks with such loathing.

Of contemporary authors, few have used the language more effectively than Rudyard Kipling, yet he seems to have been hopelessly ignorant of the new canon. In his short story, "At the End of the Passage," selected wholly at random, the abhorrent "said" occurs seventy-three times—about once every hundred words—as against only thirteen occurrences of substitutes. Incidentally, we may note that the simple "said" is found eight times on one page of about 370 words. Like examples may be found in our own Poe, and even in Howells.

Undue repetition of any word is, of course, to be avoided, but why fly to the opposite extreme? Why so evidently go out of your way to escape the natural expression? The very effort defeats itself, and frequently where "said" would pass without notice the forced substitute obtrudes itself to the distraction of the reader.

A friend suggests that this new dogma may be an outgrowth of George Meredith's example. He evidently did shun the word's excessive recurrence; yet, while some of his phrasing is abrupt and harsh, he does not follow the practice ad absurdum. His imitators, as often happens, have observed the letter and wholly missed the spirit of his usage—have copied the form with all its faults, but without its redeeming qualities of style.

If the word "obsession" were not so sadly overworked just now, I should apply it to this fad—this setting up of a new literary fetish. Of course, it is not affected even now by writers of the first class, though it is, unfortunately, by a few whose popularity for the moment gives it vogue.

THE INCOME TAX.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with interest both Mr. Root's speech on the income tax and your comment thereon in the Nation of September 11. It is undesirable that a large number of citizens should feel that they bear no burdens for the support of the government. That is what has happened under all forms of indirect taxation. Because the mass of the people were ignorant that they paid the tariff, they clung to that form of taxation. But all taxes can be and are shifted, except the personal property tax (and that is not paid) and the poll tax. As Mr. Root says, the income tax will fall chiefly upon the industrial communities. Yet the whole country will pay the tax; for when the income derived from the industries is taxed, the price of the products will be adjusted to the increased cost of production, and the wages of labor will also be adjusted to the new conditions. It has been said that the laborer pays all taxes. It would be truer to say that the consumer and the laborer pay all taxes. The tax on professional incomes will likewise be paid by the consumers of the professional services.

If a knowledge of the working of economic laws could be diffused among Americans, none would cherish the delusion that he did not pay an income tax, or the "single tax," if that should ever prevail.

RACE SEGREGATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the last issue of the Nation you commend the editor of the Lexington, Ky., Herald for remonstrating against the segregation of the races in the departments at Washington, which policy, he says, when transmitted to lower channels may be most disastrous. You quote him as saying: "No greater calamity could befall this nation than to have included in its inhabitants millions of people of any race in whose face the door of hope is shut."

Now, at the risk of being classed by you among the "ignorant" or "reactionaries," I want to say that there is no "door of hope" closed against the negro in this country, but the door of hope for amalgamation with the white race. As a protection to future generations and to the integrity of the white race this door must be ever closed, and to make it all the more secure every approach to it must and will be guarded with vigilance. This can only be done by laws requiring segregation of the races in public places. To race pride (or race prejudice, if you prefer to call it that) we must look to retain the purity of the white race in this country, and all signs go to show that this race pride is not weakening. It is just as strong in California against the idea of amalgamating with the Japanese as it is in South Carolina against mixing with the negro, and the white people of Maine would have the same legal separation of the races that they have in Mississippi if the negroes outnumbered the whites in that State.

THE COURTS AND THE LAW.

Certainty and Justice: Studies of the Conflict between Precedent and Progress in the Development of the Law. By Frederic R. Coudert. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50 net.

Justice and the Modern Law. By Everett V. Abbot. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.60 net.

Our Judicial Oligarchy. By Gilbert E. Roe. New York: B. W. Huebsch. $1 net.

These three books supply considerable material for a study in the psychology of the present popular feeling towards the courts. The authors agree that this feeling is one of hostility to judges, or at least to the legal system administered by our judiciary, but they differ about the causes.

Mr. Coudert thinks that the two main reasons for dissatisfaction are, first, that the law of to-day is somewhat out of harmony with real life, because of the rapid economic and social changes of the last generation and the tardy response of the law to such changes; secondly, the great expense, delay, and uncertainty attending litigation. In his opinion, it is the law and the lawyers that are distrusted by the public rather than the courts.

Mr. Abbot, on the other hand, is certain that our law is all right, and that the confused and unsatisfactory situation in which we find ourselves is due to the indisposition of judges to discard precedents and their inability to reason logically and fearlessly. His view appears to be that if all judges would take a course under him in ethics and logic, things would right themselves easily. "If, in any jurisdiction of the United States," he declares, "the law was suddenly to be administered as it actually is, the people would receive justice." Justice, he defines as "a real equality in opportunity and a real brotherhood in effort"; and his book is intended "to show that justice is much nearer to us as the feasible reality of a hard and work-a-day world than any man dreams." Let all judges adopt the ethics of Mr. Abbot and learn from him how and when to apply "the principle of sufficient reason," "the principle of alternatives," "the test of the reductio ad absurdum," and "the principle of the argumentative traverse," and the popular clamor against the courts will give way to a well-nigh universal acclaim that we "have an ideal system of justice."

Mr. Roe has no faith in our common law or in our judges. These judges, following the example of their English forebears, "habitually think in the terms of the rich and powerful. This process of thinking has built up a system of law barbarous in its injustice and inequality." The only part of our law worthy of commendation is that found in "progressive legislation," and much of that has been destroyed by the courts. Hence Mr. Roe characterizes them as "our judicial oligarchy." He declares that the judiciary is the weakest branch of the government, and yet its members "are constantly tempted to a conflict in which they must always be worsted." This tendency amazes him. Indeed, his astonishment at the temerity of judges in constantly running amuck is equalled only by his indignation at their tyranny.

If we turn from their consideration of the causes of popular discontent with our judiciary to their discussion of the particular faults of the courts, we shall find our three authors still at variance. Mr. Roe does not hesitate to charge the courts with usurpation of the power to declare laws unconstitutional. No such authority is expressly given to them by the Constitution, and, in his opinion, ought never to have been exercised by them. Their decisions under this usurped power, he asserts, "protect special privilege and represent ideas of government and of law which are in conflict with the convictions of a majority of the people." With such notions Mr. Abbot has no patience. While he admits that the courts have committed serious error at times in declaring beneficent laws unconstitutional, "the tendency to err," he declares, "is not in the direction of declaring too many laws unconstitutional, but in the direction of not declaring enough laws unconstitutional." The power to strike down unconstitutional statutes is, in his opinion, confided to the courts by the fundamental law, and is "the wisest means ever taken by a country to save itself against sorrow and distress." Our country has "by command of the people themselves made the square deal the ultimate and supreme law of the land." It has provided that every man who thinks he is oppressed may "seek protection against invasion of his rights by resort to the quiet chambers of an impartial tribunal where both sides can be heard, rather than to the heat and passion of political struggle."

Nor has Mr. Abbot any greater tolerance of Mr. Roe's programme of social justice, which the courts have shattered, than of his charge of judicial usurpation in the shattering. Of the advocate of such a programme, Mr. Abbot says:

Inspired by a yearning to alleviate sufferings which are only too obvious, filled with an anxious desire to give a square deal to the under dog, he devises all sorts of experimental industrial legislation, and grows hotly impatient of anything which delays or hinders his benevolent projects. When some court interposes a constitutional objection to his enactments, instead of trying to convince the court of its error, he is all for abolishing the court as an eighteenth-century obstacle to twentieth-century progress.

As one reason why the people distrust the courts, Mr. Roe asserts that "the poor man is not on an equality with the rich one before the courts." He admits that the rich litigant will always have great advantage over his poorer opponent because of his ability to employ better counsel, prepare his case better, and endure more easily the law's delays. But this is not the inequality which arouses popular distrust of the courts. Mr. Roe's "charge against the courts is that their judges habitually think in the terms of the rich and powerful. The training, sympathies, experiences and general view of life of most judges has made this inevitable." He then cites in support of this charge the judicial decisions which developed the fellow-servant doctrine and the rules as to contributory negligence and assumption of risk. But he makes no allusion to the many legal doctrines established by the courts which favor the poor at the expense of the rich.

Had Mr. Roe wished to be fair towards the judges, he would have given as much prominence to the "alluring nuisance" cases as to those relating to master and servant. He would have informed his readers that the alluring nuisance doctrine originated in opinions written by Judge Dillon, of the United States Circuit Court, and by Justice Hunt, of the Federal Supreme Court; that Judge Dillon resigned his judgeship and became counsel for the Gould interests; that Justice Hunt was a social aristocrat, and before going on the bench had been counsel for banks, railways, and similar interests; and yet that these men, with the concurrence of their associates, established the doctrine that a railway company which allows a turn-table to remain exposed and unguarded, where children may be tempted to play with it, is to be regarded as holding out implied invitation to such children to play with it, and, accordingly, if children are thus allured upon turn-tables or other dangerous premises, and are injured, they may recover damages from the railway company, or other landowners. In the leading case of Stout vs. Sioux City Railway, above referred to, a boy of six years, who had wandered three-quarters of a mile from his house to play with the defendant's alluring turn-table, with a crushed foot as the result, obtained a verdict of $7,500, which was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Certainly, the judges who established the "alluring-nuisance" doctrine did not habitually think in the terms of the rich and powerful. And a person would run no risk who should undertake to match every decision cited by Mr. Roe in support of his charge against the courts by one in which the rule laid down by judges has favored the poor man. Indeed, no one can study the decisions of English and American courts with care and candor without reaching the conclusion that the body of law thus developed is not the expression of class selfishness, but, on the contrary, is an honest and in the main an adequate system of principles under which justice can be fairly administered between litigants without respect to class, or rank, or condition.

This seems to be Mr. Coudert's view, for he declares that it is absurd to say that the doctrines of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and of fellow servants were due to class bias on the part of the judges. Mr. Abbot condemns the fellow-servant rule, as well as the doctrine of assumption of risk by servants; but he ascribes their acceptance by English and American judges, not to the existence of class bias on their part, but to their mistaken assumption that a master's liability for the acts of his servants rests upon public policy. He declares that the "principle of legal responsibility for delegated acts had been recognized by the unanimous perceptions of mankind for a period which long preceded even the obscure beginnings of the common law." With all due respect for Mr. Abbot's learning and confidence, we do not hesitate to deny his assertion. The liability of a master under our law for the conduct of his servants extends beyond their expressly delegated acts, and includes their acts and omissions in the master's employment, though done in disregard of his general orders or special command. This liability is far more extensive than is recognized in other legal systems. It does not result from the unanimous perceptions of mankind, but has been slowly and cautiously evolved in English law and is deliberately based upon considerations of practical expediency.

Of the three books under consideration Mr. Coudert's is the best. It displays a wide and varied experience at the bar; a philosophic apprehension of legal principles, a keen wit, and a lucid style. It is interesting and instructive throughout. Mr. Abbot's volume is a real contribution to the literature of the law. While the reader will be reminded often of Sidney Smith's remark that he wished he were as sure of anything as Tom Macaulay was of everything, he will learn much that is worth knowing and be stimulated by many novel suggestions in legal science. Mr. Roe holds a brief against the courts, and argues his cause with all the zeal of counsel whose retainer is a contingent fee. His statements are frequently inaccurate; his views are partisan, and his conclusions not always trustworthy. The book is suited to stir up class hatred, to generate hostility to the courts, without sufficient cause, and to sow seeds of social mischief.

CURRENT FICTION.

His Great Adventure. By Robert Herrick. New York: The Macmillan Co.

Joan Thursday. By Louis Joseph Vance. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

Of course, there is no good reason why a novelist should feel obliged to stick to the last of realism or of romance upon which he has chanced to shape the greater portion of his work. Mr. Arnold Bennett is our triumphant example of the workman who can turn his hand to anything, and the well-wishers who desire him to limit himself to Clayhangers and Old Wives' Tales rather amuse him. Mr. Robert Herrick, though he has evidently had to struggle from time to time with an impulse towards romance, has never hitherto omitted to struggle. In his latest book he frankly abandons what is for him "the legitimate," and steps forward to do his turn as a vaudeville artist. The result is not altogether happy. Mr. Herrick has done his best to be light and trivial, to give his new audience what it wants. Perhaps he has succeeded; as we scan the lists of best-sellers for the coming months, we shall know. A first impression is that his performance is too evidently that of an "amateur." His manner has a nervous jauntiness which does not convey the desired effect of high spirits.

The hero of the "great adventure" is an unsuccessful and penniless playwright. At the moment when he is ready to confess himself "down and out," he rescues a "doped" and dying millionaire from a New York gutter. The millionaire gives him a mysterious commission, involving the robbery of a safe in California, an escape to Europe by way of Mexico, and the eventual transference to a playwright's pocket of two millions in exchange for the abstracted securities. The millionaire has ordered that all the property (or loot) shall be given to "Melody." The hero is far slower than the reader in discovering that this name (like "Henrietta" of famous memory) belongs both to a mine and a girl. He develops the mine, and, though in some vague way he regards the property as a trust, proceeds to devote the profits to the founding of a national "People's Theatre" which shall reform all current abuses in connection with the stage. He seems to know less about theatrical conditions than any other person who can ever have written plays and tried to get them produced. However, since his absurd enterprise does finally reveal the real Melody to him (in the person of his only successful actress), one ought not to grumble. It is a pity that a writer of Mr. Herrick's inborn seriousness should strain himself to produce such laborious nonsense as this.

Mr. Vance's nonsense has never been laborious. His Brass Bowls and Black Bags, however fantastic in design, have contained the spirit of youth and adventure. And now, behold, he abandons that happy field of sophomoric achievement, and presents a story of "real" life—more consistently realistic than anything Mr. Herrick has ever done. He also appeals to a fresh audience—Mr. Herrick's audience. And for this he thinks it unnecessary—or inexpedient—to employ fresh materials. In the skeleton, this present plot is strongly like that of Mr. Herrick's "One Woman's Life," which, in its turn, recalls Mr. Dreiser's "Jennie Gerhardt." Joan Thursday is a girl of low class, though not without trace of better blood than is usually to be found in a New York tenement. She is beautiful and pleasure-loving, and her home life is unspeakably tawdry and distasteful. She is always pursued by men, and at last, discharged from her counter because she has refused the advances of a floor-walker, she is thrown into the street by her angry father. Good luck prevents her from becoming a woman of the street; but she has the temperament, and, short of that, falls as low as she may, morally, in the course of mounting her ladder towards success. She is faithful to nobody, to nothing except her ambition to be admired, to rouse the desire of all men. The type is common enough, and this re-study of it is so skilfully done that the lover of realism, in the best sense, will not be likely to dismiss it as "unpleasant."

The Marriage of Mlle. Gimel. By René Bazin. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Some of these short stories have already appeared in a volume called "Humble Love," which was withdrawn from circulation. The author has rescued several of the condemned stories and added the "Marriage of Mlle. Gimel," which is the longest of the tales in the present volume. M. Bazin has here put aside pastoral surroundings and their influence upon character and has placed his struggling poor in the heart of the city of Paris. The problem he deals with is of a kind hitherto untouched by him. Mlle. Gimel is a poor stenographer, pretty, simple, and unaffected. An army officer, who has seen her daily at breakfast in a humble dairy room, falls in love with her and proposes marriage. The girl presents her suitor to her mother. To avert a stain upon the honor of the army, the mother sees fit to acquaint Evelyne with the fact that she is merely a child whom Mme. Gimel had adopted from a foundling asylum. The girl accordingly refuses to marry her officer, and he, for the honor of the army, leaves her. But things end happily.

In the "Little Sisters of the Poor" the writer returns to rural life. It is a sketch of a poor man's soul. Père Le Bolloche had been the handsomest man in his regiment, but is now a humble chair-weaver and fallen on hard days. His one solace is his daughter, Désirée. For her sake proud Père Le Bolloche decides to eat the bread of charity, and to end his days with the "Little Sisters of the Poor." There he revives. The strong, incisive strokes with which M. Bazin draws his simple, blunt country folk show him once more a master of the pastoral.

Madeleine at Her Mirror: A Woman's Diary. By Marcelle Tinayre. Authorized translation by Winifred Stevens. New York: John Lane Co.

This "is not a novel," the author explains, "but a collection of impressions, of dreams, and of memories, in which fiction mingles with fact." It belongs, that is, to a type of literature, increasingly popular these days, which permits a writer to deal in little intimacies of life without the risk of being charged either with making a bald confession or with setting up formally as a critic. It is a compromise in which the usual French and English manners are blended, and the result is happy. For English readers, at least, the self-revelation of the French profits by a slight veil of fiction.

The narrator of these chapters is a well-to-do widow of thirty-five, the mother of two children, and the possessor of town and country houses. Parisian fashions, entertaining, the importunities of lovers, the splendor of spring and autumn in the country, foreign politics, apartment-hunting for relatives, together with a slight concern over advancing age—to note a few of the topics chosen—are commonplaces the world over. Yet Mme. Tinayre bestows on them the charm of good taste and of shrewd observation; and contrives, seemingly through sheer artlessness, to create scenes which are almost faultless in technique.

A Fool and His Money. By George Barr McCutcheon. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Mr. McCutcheon's fool is an American—novelist by trade—who, thanks to a liberal legacy, can indulge his predilection for the feudal age by purchasing a dilapidated castle on the Danube. He thinks to find in this picturesque ruin a "quiet, inspirational spot" where he may prosecute his literary labors under ideally romantic conditions. But no sooner has he taken up his residence in its draughty halls than he finds himself actively involved in a very modern drama of international divorce. Such, indeed, are the complications—social, financial, and sentimental—in which his proprietary responsibilities have involved the chivalrous novelist, that he does not hesitate at the first opportunity to sell Schloss Rothhoefen at a generous profit, and follow the heroine across the Atlantic with all speed.

In the way of doughty deeds we find to record only two opportune punches delivered upon the offending heads of masculine impertinents—a sad falling off from those days of daring do when the "Prisoner of Zenda" and "Graustark" were household words.

THE EARLY AMERICAN NAVY.

A Naval History of the American Revolution. By Gardner W. Allen. In two volumes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $3 net.

Dr. Allen is a master of source material, and has given us the story of many events for which we might look elsewhere in vain. Much of the space devoted to adventure is, indeed, a sort of Homeric catalogue of ships, accurate and thorough enough, but dry as the remaining biscuit after a voyage. All the painful details of the chase to leeward and the chase to the windward, of fighting on the larboard side, and "luffing across," and of "raking the decks," and of the conduct of the wounded and of their sufferings, told over and over, in engagement after engagement, become wearisome and confusing. They might interest an Annapolis freshman as supplementary reading, but the book seems to have another aim. Some accounts, as that of the New Providence expedition, are made tedious by giving in succession three or four contemporary, and often contradictory, accounts in the language of an untutored sailor or ship's officer, instead of furnishing the results of a critical comparison of the several original stories. This uncritical attitude extends to accepting even a single newspaper account (Vol. I, p. 76). These indifferently written contemporary narratives are often given at great length, to the utter perplexity of the reader as to what really happened. The style of the author, himself, is that of one solemnly presenting information; there is none of the charm of the eager narrator who attracts by his own enthusiasm. Nor does he show sense of proportion. Yet this is not the result of helplessness in the presence of a task too great, for now and then there are very valuable and comprehensive summaries of general conditions.

In spite of these failings, the work contains much that is valuable. It has the best available account in English of the French evasion of the neutrality laws, before the day of open alliance, by the devious process of inaction, denial, and imperturbable prevarication. The author corrects some common errors of thinking in showing that, while man for man and ship for ship the British overmatched the Americans, their material for crews was no better than that furnished by the seafaring population of New England, if as good. Even their immense advantage of centuries of military discipline, naval tradition, and esprit de corps, was lessened by the incompetency and indolence of some of the British fleet commanders, and the official corruption in British dockyards and naval stations. Moreover, if American captures of British property on the seas inflicted no great injury in proportion to the whole, yet in the early years of the war they were of the utmost importance. But for these supplies the cause would have languished and died. Mr. Allen calculates that more than two thousand American vessels were employed in privateering in the Revolution. These and the Continental navy succeeded in keeping open communications with European countries and sustaining foreign interest and sympathy, especially in France. If the British, as Lord Barrington recommended, could have suppressed this commerce and communication, they would probably have strangled the rebellion in its infancy, and without the help of an army. Mr. Allen concludes that on the whole the injury done to the British navy by the American naval forces was almost negligible, and to the British commerce far from disabling, though not without effect in the general result.

Manuel d'Archéologie Américaine. Amérique préhistorique—Civilisations disparues. Par H. Beuchat. Préface par Henry Vignaud. Paris: A. Picard et Fils. 815 pages. 15 francs.

Pierre d'Ailly et la Découverte de l'Amérique. Par Louis Salembier. Paris: Letouzey et Ané. 56 pages.

Améric Vespuce: Ses Voyages et ses Découvertes devant la critique. 43 pages. L'attribution de son nom au Nouveau Monde. 60 pages. Par Henry Vignaud. Paris: E. Leroux.

Les Thèses nouvelles sur l'origine de Christophe Colomb: Espagnol! Juif! Corse! Par Henry Vignaud. Paris: E. Leroux. 1913. 20 pages.

The publication of a full Manual of American Archæology, complete to date, should be reckoned an event. In his preface to the stout volume of M. Beuchat, the experienced Henry Vignaud says:

> It answers all that we can expect rightfully from a work of this kind. Its publication is in advance of any work of like character in Germany or England or America, rich as they are in writings on the matter. It does honor to French Americanism. Compliments are due for it to the publisher who has chosen to add it to his fine collection of archæological manuals—and to the American Mæcenas whose encouragement has enabled the author to bring to a good end his long and difficult labor, unique of its kind.

The book is dedicated "to the enlightened protector of American studies and of all researches relative to the New Continent—the Duc de Loubat."

The completeness of the work and the necessity of it may be plainly seen from a summary of the contents. From the beginning, there are twenty-five close pages of bibliography in the order of subjects treated; and this is further supplemented by the copious references of the footnotes in the course of the work. Abbreviations also refer to fifty-four special periodical publications. An introduction of eighty-six pages (five chapters) treats of the discovery of America—in its physical conditions of winds and ocean currents, Pacific and Atlantic; reputed discoveries by Chinese and Scandinavians, and the history of Greenland; voyages reported through the ages in search of land westward from Europe; discoveries of Christopher Columbus; and other voyages of discovery of the sixteenth century from the Cabots to Balboa, and the exploration of the North American coast.

The first part of the first book (eleven chapters) is devoted to prehistoric North America, from the glacial period down. The second part (two chapters) deals with South America—its fossil men and Neolithic age.

Book second (475 pages) is a methodical and exhaustive study of all that is known of the civilized native peoples of America.

In his pages of conclusion, the author touches on a subject whose full treatment would have required a longer study of the uncivilized peoples of America than the limits of his book would allow. It is the obscure question of the peopling of the different parts of the New World. Many hypotheses are enumerated from the European discovery to our own day, finding for Indians and Eskimos a descent from the lost tribes of Israel, Mongols, Carthaginians, French Cave Dwellers; or, vice-versa, making America itself the Eden whence lost Atlantis and Europe were peopled. A survey of the state of these peoples prior to European discovery leads to a final conclusion:

> On the one hand, Europeans were too civilized when they discovered America to be obliged to borrow greatly from its inhabitants. On the other hand, the nature of the New Continent was not different enough from that of the Old to require any adoption of the habits of the aborigines. Thus the influence of America on Europe really begins only after the formation of European centres in the New World.

Besides the analytical table of contents, there are twenty-seven pages of finely printed, double-columned Index. Truly, a full book, ready and serviceable for every reader interested in America of the pre-European past.

The pamphlet of M. Salembier gives a lucid summary of a question that is of some importance in recent Columbian controversy—the nature of Pierre d'Ailly's cosmographic notions, and particularly at what period of his career Christopher Columbus made his acquaintance with them. The author ends by touching on another question more or less remotely connected with the former—whether the human heroism of Columbus, which nobody denies, was supplemented by all-round religious virtue such as the Church demands in her canonized saints. He refers to a little-known discussion of the subject by Henry Vignaud (Journal de la Société des Américanistes de Paris, 1909), and contributes the following unpublished opinion of the competent Bollandists:

> Thanks to a communication with which they have honored us, we know that they admire Columbus as a hero, but they have never dreamed of putting him forward and having him venerated as one of the Blessed.

Since the completion of his great work on Columbus, Mr. Henry Vignaud has published two notices of Americus Vespucius, from whom we have our name, if not our local habitation. The critical investigation of authentic and contemporary documents has made such rapid progress that novelty as well as interest attaches to these competent accounts of what is now known of the real voyages and discoveries of Vespucius, and how his name came to be given to the New World which Columbus had discovered:

> Yet the work of Vespucius was considerable. While Columbus opened the way for him, as he did for Cortes and Pizarro and all the Conquistadores, it is also true that to the Florentine navigator alone belongs the merit of knowing what he had discovered—a fact undeniable to-day.

In a few sufficient pages, M. Vignaud executes recent light-weight hypotheses making Columbus a Spaniard or Jew or Corsican by race.

Problems of Power: A Study of International Politics, from Sadowa to Kirk-Kilissé. By William Morton Fullerton. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.25 net.

Educated at Andover Academy and Harvard, and for twenty years resident in France as Paris correspondent of the London Times, Mr. Fullerton has enjoyed a cosmopolitan training and unusual opportunities for feeling the hidden threads of European diplomacy and finance which centre in the French capital. His book is the most interesting volume in English on recent international politics since the publication of Tardieu's "France and the Alliances" five years ago. It surpasses the latter in breadth of scope and richness of style; in fact, its brilliant paradoxes and frequent allusions to undescribed diplomatic events may prove caviare to Americans who do not read foreign news with some attention.

Mr. Fullerton starts with the general thesis that two occult powers behind the façade of governments are now determining the destinies of the world. The first is "the disseminated wealth of the democracy, canalized both by the plutocratic oligarchy of the bankers, whose clients, the modern states, are constrained to apply to them for immense loans, and by the great manufacturers and mining proprietors, who tend to be actuated solely by economic interest"; and the other is "the mysterious pervasive force known as public opinion, which is becoming more and more conscious of its efficacy." He then sketches the rise of the United States as a world Power, as typified in the career of Mr. Roosevelt, and contrasts his influence as President in the United States with the lack of influence of Presidents in the French Republic. He thinks that the extraordinary enthusiasm with which Mr. Roosevelt was received in France in 1909 was due to the fact that the ex-President personified ideals and methods for which all France was yearning. Mr. Fullerton's analysis of the domestic politics of France—her need of a stronger President, of a change from scrutin d'arrondissement to scrutin de liste, of a "constructive nationalism," and of a firm foreign policy—is the best-informed and most valuable part of his volume. For forty years, from the dismemberment of France in 1871 until German aggression was rebuffed at Agadir in 1911, France was unfortunately distracted with the internal crises of monarchism, Romanism, Boulangism, Panamism, Dreyfusism, and Syndicalism. French politicians were so absorbed in party passions that they sacrificed the external national interests of their country and allowed France to become the plaything of Bismarck's malign manœuvres on the European chessboard. But since the time when Germany began to bully France in Morocco and France established an entente cordiale with England (April 8, 1904), France has begun to "float on the high tide of one of those miraculous moral 'resurgences' peculiar to the soil that has given birth to Vercingetorix, St. Louis, Joan of Arc, and Gambetta."

Her true policy now, thinks the author, is to exert herself internationally as an active, cordial, and self-reliant member of the Triple Entente in the North Sea, the Mediterrancan, the Caribbean, and wherever else her interests are threatened by German aggression. Besides putting her own domestic political house in order, France must > construct on her Eastern frontier a canal permitting Dunkirk to become a rival of Antwerp, the iron-masters of the Meurthe and Moselle to buy their coal in England instead of Germany, and the whole French industrial world to break loose from the bonds now linking them to their German rivals (p. 266).

She must not loan so much of her capital on foreign credit until she has more adequately supplied the financial needs of the small shopkeeper and small manufacturer in France. When the Panama Canal is opened, she must build around the globe, a little to the south of the British "All-Red Route," a French "All-Blue Route"— > from Tahiti through the Canal, by Guadeloupe and Martinique to Dakar, thence to Bordeaux and Brest, and, by the Rhone Valley, to Marseilles, where, once again taking to the sea, and skirting the North African coast from Algiers to Bizerta, it proceeds through the Suez Canal to Jibutil in the Persian Gulf, and to the Grand Comores, Madagascar, and La Réunion in the Indian Ocean. It then turns northward, touching Asia at Saigon; and passing thence to the north of Australia, finds in the New Hebrides and in New Caledonia (where Australia may one day procure the iron of which she stands in need) its last station before it is riveted again at Tahiti, in mid-Pacific (p. 314).

France must also reëstablish friendly relations with the Vatican. More than all else, she must not forget "the intolerable crime and egregious blunder of the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine."

From what has been said, the reader will have surmised that Mr. Fullerton does not look down upon mundane affairs with Jovian impartiality; in fact, his volume is the neatest statement we have seen in English of the French feeling of rage and impotency at German power and success. The choice of sub-title, "from Sadowa to Kirk-Kilissé," is due to the fact that these two points, in the author's opinion, mark the limits during which Bismarck's malign influence has been in the ascendant:

> Bismarck retarded the work of the French Revolution, gagging France and flinging Europe back into the old régime. . . . The normal evolution of every nation in Europe has been disturbed, if not utterly deranged, by the action of Germany in annexing Schleswig-Holstein and in seizing the French provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. The trend of European history during the last forty years has been determined by these titanic blunders (p. 43).

Space forbids us to follow, and much less to criticise, the ingenious chain of diplomatic detail by which the author sustains this thesis. We note, however, that he makes no effort apparently to get at Germany's side of the case; he quotes almost no German newspapers or books; what are we to expect of one who draws his information about Germans from French newspapers or works with such suggestive titles as Blondel's "Les Embarras de l'Allemagne" and Gaston's "L'Allemagne aux Abois"?

Mr. Fullerton's advice to Americans, based on his long observation of European politics, is that they wake up to a realization of their new rights and duties as a World Power. It is the familiar theme of Gen. Homer Lea and Admiral Mahan. When the Panama Canal is opened, the geographical centre of gravity will shift from the Mediterranean to the Caribbean; national isolation, freedom from entangling alliances, will no longer be possible for the United States; "Americans must henceforth reason and act as political animals, in conformity with the prejudices and customs of the Old World"; in other words, they must build a strong navy.

In spite of Mr. Fullerton's sarcastic denunciations of Bismarck and Germany, which are curiously inconsistent with his own worship of the divine right of brute force and with his recommendations to France and the United States, his book is valuable and stimulating. It deserves Mr. Roosevelt's natural commendation, cited in the publisher's announcement: "Every American with any interest in the future of his country ought to be familiar with the facts which Mr. Fullerton sets forth."

Pbilippine problems will share with Indian affairs the chief interest of the thirty-first annual Lake Mohonk Conference of Friends of the Indian and other Dependent Peoples, which will meet at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., October 22-24. Attention will also be given to conditions in Porto Rico. About two hundred and fifty members, most of whom have personal knowledge of the subjects discussed, will attend as the guests of Mr. Daniel Smiley, by whom the conference is called. Dr. Elmer Ellsworth Brown, Chancellor of New York University, will preside.

In public library work among all the peoples of the world Baroda, a native state of India, holds a leading place. Connected with the Government is the Central Library Department, which not only maintains one of the finest libraries in India in the capital city, but also circulates books throughout the state in travelling libraries which remain at each village three months, when fresh books are furnished. The department also gives about $100 a year for the purchase of books for the local libraries to every village whose inhabitants subscribe an equal amount. There are now 275 public libraries with about 156,000 books, and the number of readers within the last three years is said to have increased nearly 360 per cent. The eldest son of the Maharaja, it may be added, graduated at Harvard in 1911.

"The Publisher" (Houghton Mifflin), by Robert S. Yard, contains four breezy essays on the art and science of publishing. In the first the new editor of the Century controverts the opinion that publishing is the worst possible trade. Few offer more fascinating and difficult problems. Next is discussed why a book sells. Primarily, Mr. Yard thinks, for incalculable reasons—because it is the sort of thing many people want at a particular time—then, in minor degree, because of the enthusiasm and conviction which the publisher infuses into his entire selling staff. There is cited the instance of a rather poor book which was carried into wide popularity through the sheer infatuation of its sponsor. It is shown that a best seller, except so far as it incidentally enlivens the whole business, may be a doubtful gain. Mr. Yard's figures for a best seller netting the publisher only twenty-five hundred dollars for a hundred thousand sold will be regarded with general skepticism. If on a scale of sales in the hundred thousands it normally costs 28 per cent. of gross income to do business, apart from manufacture and extraordinary advertising, we would all better stop buying books until the publishing business has been put in order by an efficiency expert. Salesmanship is treated interestingly, especially with regard to the improvement of canvassing for subscription editions. A wholly reasonable light is also put upon the movement to maintain net prices. In fact, the Government departments have recently taken towards breakfast foods and the like at fixed prices a more friendly attitude than was formerly held towards books. In discussing the relations of author, publisher, and agent, Mr. Yard feels that direct dealing is better and an agency is an unnecessary evil, except when the author cannot get sight of his publisher or editor. Authors, like poets, are an irritable race and prone to unreasonable dissatisfactions. To change one's publisher is generally to do ill. That is sound advice. We note that henceforward all poetry must be published at the author's expense. Irritability may be expected to increase accordingly among the singing clan. Generally informing and always entertaining, the manner of the book is journalistic and undistinguished. The old-school publisher, when betrayed into authorship, managed to imply a pedestal beneath him. Some publishers even graced the pose. Mr. Yard is, though enthusiastic, quite without such illusions about his trade. It seems to us that old-school publishing was none the worse for what may have been an illusion of championship of literature. The conception of literature as such barely intrudes in Mr. Yard's vivacious pages.

"The World's Leading Conquerors," by W. L. Bevan, is the latest volume in the biographical series of the World's Leaders (Holt), edited by Prof. W. P. Trent. Successive chapters tell of Alexander the Great, Cæsar, Charlemagne, the Ottoman Sultans from Osman to Suleiman the Magnificent, the Spanish Conquistadores like Cortez and Pizarro, and of Napoleon. In this wide field of history Mr. Bevan succeeds admirably in selecting the best recent material, including the products of German scholarship, and in writing very readable and yet accurate biographical sketches. He gives more than a mere personal narrative of the life of each conqueror, for he has interwoven in most cases a very fair general historical account of the period in which the conqueror lived. He also avoids the easy mistake of giving too much space to military history; he makes space to suggest the less visible elements which have ushered in great changes in history. There are portraits of the conquerors, but no maps of their territories or plans of their battles.

In spite of its sounding title, it does not need the preface to William Arkwright's "Knowledge and Life" (Lane) to tell us that several of the essays of the volume are reprinted from the newspapers. This is less from the subject matter, curiously ill adapted even to British journalistic needs, than from a general looseness of construction. The book's title is gained from a half-dozen little disquisitions upon Christian and Buddhistic philosophy, irritatingly purposeless and obscure of phrase. Mingled inharmoniously with them are several subjective sketches of African travel, equally pointless, and two simple London tales, which succeed in striking a sturdier note. What the writer may originally have designed was an attempt to interpret or comment upon the chief religious legends; but the motley contents betray an ultimate eagerness to fill up the volume with mere random productions. Of interest is the occasional exhibition of a late-romantic malady of style, where the writer abandons all sincerity of tone, and, as he self-consciously puts it, attempts "to gild with glamour the edges of the commonplace and print its titles in amaranth, to entice from the empyrean, as formerly the daughters of men did entice the sons of God, that spirit of the green flame, by name Inspiration." From this the two London stories are refreshingly free.

God sifted a whole nation that He might send choice grain over into this wilderness, declared an eminent citizen of Massachusetts nearly two centuries and a half ago. Since three out of every four of our present-day immigrants come, says Frederic J. Haskin in "The Immigrant" (Revell), from countries where public education is unheard of, where popular participation in the affairs of the government is undreamed of, where dire poverty is the rule, it is manifest that the immigration problem is much graver than in the day of William Stoughton. Frank Julian Warne in "The Immigrant Invasion" (Dodd, Mead), and Henry Pratt Fairchild in "Immigration" (Macmillan), have also collected a great amount of material on this subject. Each of these three writers presents the immigrant in a way to quicken imagination and stir the political consciousness. As we see him on the dock, he may command but a scant amount of our attention, but when, as in the works before us, he appears as the product of the vast economic, religious, and political eruptions of the ages, he becomes absorbingly significant. For we cannot forget that the history of immigration has been a history of successive waves of population, from sources ever lower in the economic, if not in the social, scale. If it has seemed at any time that this country was about to adjust itself to a certain racial admixture, a new and more difficult element has presented itself. And the end appears far from sight. The process will go on, declares Mr. Fairchild, who recalls an assertion of Gen. Walker that immigration by the lowest class "will not be permanently stopped so long as any difference of economic level exists between our population and that of the most degraded communities abroad." This assertion, which amounts to the fact that population, like money, will always seek the best market, may seem discouraging. Yet the opposite would occasion even greater apprehension; for, except to the extent that restriction is actually accomplished by law, a cessation of the stream of immigration to the United States can only mean that economic conditions in this country have fallen to so low a pitch that it is no longer worth while for the citizens of the meanest and most backward foreign country to make the moderate effort to get here.

It is curious to note that while the general tendency of economic thought has been steadily away from laissez-faire, that doctrine still has a firm grasp on the mind with reference to immigration. To be sure, there may be signs of a theoretic limitation of it, in the immigration laws which we have incorporated in our statute books in the last thirty years. But, after all, the movement has increased rather than diminished, and is incontestably of a laissez-faire character. In its other operations, economics has been more and more subjected to the interplay of political, sociological, and even biological considerations. In this particular field there has been virtually no effort to suppress its cry of hands off. Conceivably, this is largely because of the difficulty of agreeing on an alternative. Apparently we have not sufficiently considered the pros and cons to know whether restriction would be likely to prove a blessing or a bane.

The first volume of A. A. Wotzel's translation from the Dutch of Pierson's "Principles of Economics," dealing with the subjects of value in exchange and money, appeared in 1902. A second volume (Macmillan), treating of production and the revenue of the state, now completes the work. The two volumes together thus cover the ground traditionally embraced in general treatises on political economy. The work is, therefore, similar in scope to the well-known textbooks of Marshall, Nicholson, and Taussig. Dr. Pierson may be classified, despite his apparent eclecticism, as a disciple of Mill and the older English economists. His system of economics was evidently formulated at a time when the English classical school exercised a predominant influence over Continental economists, and, well acquainted as he is with the newer currents of thought, he remains consistently a Ricardian of the Ricardians. The theories of the Austrian school constitute the ornamentation rather than the substance of his treatment of value. Also, in the relative amount of space assigned to different topics he shows his affinity with the classical school. The discussions, for instance, of the nature of production and of the Malthusian doctrine bulk more largely than in other recent treatises. The work has two prime virtues which make it an important addition to the general textbooks of political economy. More nearly than any of its rivals, it is cosmopolitan in its economic learning. The author was intimately acquainted with the writings of the English economists and the rich economic literature of his own country, and hardly less familiar with the German and French authorities. The other great merit of the work is its admirable practicality. The author was both an economist and a statesman—a university professor and for some years Prime Minister of Holland. The combination of qualities which made this career possible distinguishes the discussion throughout. The refinements of economic reasoning are always curbed by a vigorous common sense. This quality is best displayed in the present volume in the section dealing with the revenue of the state, probably the sanest and clearest treatment of the subject to be found within the same compass in English.

Among a number of European publications on the Balkan war, each of which recounts the observations of one man, Henri Dugard's "Histoire de la Guerre contre les Turcs" (Paris: Les Marches de l'Est) distinguishes itself by giving an account of the whole conflict from the outbreak of hostilities in October, 1912, to the signing of the treaty of London in the following May. M. Dugard relies largely on the correspondents of various newspapers; but he has balanced their statements against one another so judiciously that the resulting narrative, if journalistic in style, is accurate and informing. "It is at present impossible," he observes, "to say the last word about the recent conflicts; but we can even now bring a little order out of the various reports that we have, and present a concise story of the events that followed one another so rapidly." He attempts to be perfectly impartial and simply to relate the facts; but his sympathies are evidently with the Balkan allies. One reason for this is found in his dislike of Germany; he admires the good qualities of the Turks, and attributes their defeat largely to "their mediocre Krupp guns and the stupidity of their German instructors." He urges the Balkan nations, including Rumania, to rely more on the friendship of Russia and France, and to distrust Germany and Austria. It is to be hoped that a new edition of this book, or a separate volume, will give an equally clear account of the war between Bulgaria and the other Balkan states, and of the resulting advantage to Turkey. The proper names are carelessly and inconsistently printed, and there is a rather poor map extending only from Adrianople to Constantinople.

The Cornell University Library has recently issued the sixth volume of Islandica, an annual relating to Iceland and the Fiske Icelandic collection at Cornell. This latest number, entitled "Icelandic Authors of To-day," is virtually a Who's Who. In sixty-nine pages, it gives, in bio-bibliographical form, sketches varying in length from a few lines to two or three pages. The term author is construed generously to cover not only belles-lettres, but science, journalism, philosophy, theology, medicine, jurisprudence, and politics. The number of entries and the wide range of interests shown by the titles quoted will be a surprise to persons unacquainted with the contemporary activities of Iceland. An appendix gives a list of books and essays relating to Icelandic literature since 1550. This book is the work of Halldor Hermannsson, curator of the Fiske Library.

The preface to the thirty-fourth volume of the Goethe-Jahrbuch (Literarische Anstalt), which appeared recently, contains the announcement that with this volume the publication of the annual ceases. Its place is to be taken by a new annual to be called Das Jahrbuch der Goethe-Gesellschaft. The change is due to a lack of harmony that has existed for several years between the editor of the Goethe-Jahrbuch, Prof. Ludwig Geiger, of the University of Berlin, and the ruling spirits of the Goethe Society. The separation was finally caused by the refusal on the part of the Society to subsidize the annual after this year. When Geiger published the first volume in 1880 there was no Goethe Society and the new venture relied upon its own merits for its prosperity. The seventh volume (1886) contained the first annual report of the Society, which was founded shortly after the death of the last descendant of Goethe (1885) and the opening of the Goethe Archives in Weimar. The new Society entered into an agreement with Geiger and his publisher whereby the Goethe-Jahrbuch became the official organ of the Society and a copy was to be purchased annually for each member. There were at that time nearly 1,700 members, and since then the number has gradually increased till to-day there are nearly 3,700. Naturally, the Jahrbuch became an attractive organ of communication among Goethe scholars, and for years its list of contributors contained the names of most of the prominent specialists. In recent years, however, these names have become more and more rare in the list and their places have been taken by others of less authority. Furthermore, the Archives have ceased to put hitherto unpublished material at the disposal of the editor. The reflection of scholarship has been partially obscured by the reflection of partisanship. In spite of this, Geiger deserves great credit for his part in the history of the annual, which will always remain one of the important sets in a Goethe library. The new Jahrbuch is to be edited by the eminent Goethe specialist, Prof. Hans Gerhard Gräf, of Weimar, which assures the confidence of scholars and the coöperation of the Weimar Archives.

The appeal of South America as a "land of adventure" is still strong. Opportunity to exaggerate in an entertaining manner without the danger of being contradicted is irresistible. Some writers are a bit too cautious, so that the publishers allow the illustrators to go beyond the text in satisfying the popular appetite. A good example of the breezy and entertaining books of this sort is Mr. Charles Johnson Post's "Across the Andes" (Outing Pub. Co.). The only difference here is that the illustrations are by the author, whose fondness for getting effects has led him too often to abandon his camera (if he had one) for his very ready pencil. The fact that some of the pictures are improperly labelled and some of the text considerably exaggerated will not spoil the book for the ordinary reader. The story begins with an opera-bouffe introduction in Panama, and meanders mysteriously down the West Coast, credulously including the usual smoking-room stories of Chinamen being suffocated in the ship's fumigating boiler and passengers being robbed between decks after dark. The photographs of street scenes in Lima and Arequipa are typical of Peru, but do not happen to be of the cities to which they have been assigned. Arequipa beer is not "green," and the summit of the pass of the Southern Railways of Peru is not "something over fifteen thousand feet above sea level." The picture of a balsa on Lake Titicaca is grossly exaggerated, and in general the first half of the book might better have been left unwritten. The second part, describing Mr. Post's journey overland from La Paz to the River Mapiri, the Falls of the Madeira, and the Amazon, describes a country that is only too little known, a circumstance which makes all the more provoking the fact that one cannot be absolutely sure of the author's accuracy of description. The book lacks both index and map —even "Treasure Island" had a map.

An experiment in the gradation of elementary Hebrew textbooks is made by the Rev. D. Tyssil Evans in "The Principles of Hebrew Grammar" (London: Luzac & Co.), the first part of which deals with the forms of the language. The work is intended for the use of an intermediate grade of students, those "who wish to make a serious study of Hebrew, though they may not be able to carry it to a very advanced stage." The phonology and morphology are given in considerable detail, following mainly Gesenius-Rautzsch (the twenty-eighth edition) and König. The arrangement is clear, and the treatment scholarly. Exercises in reading and writing Hebrew are added, with an English-Hebrew vocabulary. The work is an excellent guide for students; but as this first part is a stout volume of above five hundred pages, and the second part, to be devoted to the syntax, will not be of very much less extent, the cost of the whole work will be relatively great. Whether the addition of the exercises in writing is desirable for the class of students had in mind may be doubtful. When learners are familiar with the forms of a language, it is an advantage to them to come in contact with the living speech in the literature; exercises are more or less dead material. The detailed criticisms of the origin of inflectional endings and prefixes does not come within the scope of the present volume; such remarks as are made on this point are usually well considered, but it may be noted that the second syllable of ro'eh (p. 109) is not a special indication of gender, but the ordinary final form of the masculine participle in Lamed-He verbs, the syllable eh belonging to the stem.

The publication of the Epistle to the Romans and the Second Epistle of Peter with the Epistle of Jude, leaves only two books, Ephesians and First Peter, to complete the Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges (Putnam). These editions, like the others in this series, have extensive introductions and commentaries. Being designed for college students, controversy concerning matters of doctrine is avoided as much as possible, and attention is directed rather to the meaning of the Greek and the peculiarities of New Testament usage. Even so, however, the notes are very extensive and sometimes overloaded. In the Introduction to the Romans the editor, R. St. John Parry, holds that the epistle is genuine and integral, rejecting the suggestion that it is a combination of two letters. He also regards it with most critics as Paul's complete exposition of his religious views due to his desire to commend himself to a church not founded by himself, but whose assistance was needed for the prosecution of his projected missionary work in Spain. In the introduction to Second Peter and Jude, the editor, Montague Rhodes James, upholds the genuineness of Jude, but is inclined to regard Second Peter as a later production whose author had Jude before him as he wrote.

The Rev. Henry Prentice Forbes, since 1889 dean of the Theological School at St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., died at his home in Canton on Friday. Dr. Forbes was born at Paris, Me., in 1849, graduated from St. Lawrence University in 1873, and then studied at Leipzig. He was the author of "The Johannine Literature and Acts."

The death is reported from London of the Rev. Dr. Patrick Augustine Sheehan, essayist and lecturer and Canon of Cloyne, Ireland. He was born at Mallow, County Cork, in 1852. His principal writings are: "Geoffrey Austin, Student," "The Triumph of Failure," "Lost Angel of a Ruined Paradise," "Under Cedars and Stars," "Cithara Mea" (poems), "The Queen's Fillet," and "Miriam Lucas."

Science

The Influence of Monarchs: Steps in a New Science of History. By Frederick Adams Woods, M.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2 net.

This volume is a continuation of the statistical study published by Mr. Woods in 1906 on "Mental and Moral Heredity in Royalty." It is the application of biometric methods to the field of history. It aims at the establishment of a new science which the author has baptized "historiometry," and at a new philosophy of history which is to be called "the gametic interpretation of history."

The author's method, very briefly, is as follows: He takes all of the 368 monarchs who have ruled from the tenth to the end of the eighteenth century in fourteen of the principal countries of Europe, and rates them, on the basis of what historians and encyclopædias say about them, in three grades according to "intellectual qualities" as superior, average or mediocre, and inferior, or as he prefers to call them, "plus" (+), "plus or minus" (±), and "minus" (—). Similarly, in a parallel column, he rates the "condition of the country" in each of the 368 reigns in three grades as "plus," "plus or minus," or "minus" according to whether the country was "progressive" or not in the given reign. Thus, for England under the Stuarts, he gives:

Ruler, Charles II —

Affable, witty, and debonair, but had no ambition. Sensual, dissipated, indolent, and extravagant.

Condition of Country, 1660-1685 +

Important constitutional and legal advance. Growth of the House of Commons. Increase in shipping, silk trade, and banking. . . .

He then compares the two columns to see how far a "plus monarch" is accompanied by a "plus condition of country," and vice-versa. His statistical conclusion is (p. 246):

Strong, mediocre, and weak monarchs are associated with strong, mediocre, and weak periods in about 70 per cent. of the cases. Strong monarchs are associated with weak periods, and weak monarchs (including non-royal regents) with strong periods in about 10 per cent. of the cases. In about 20 per cent. of the cases mediocre monarchs are associated with strong or with weak periods, or mediocre periods are associated with strong or weak monarchs.

Or, expressing the same thing more briefly in the neat mathematical formula which Karl Pearson has made familiar, Mr. Woods places the correlation between the intellectual strength of the ruler and the condition of the country at r=.60 to .70. This correlation is a high one in comparison with the general run of anthropometric and biometric results. It is greater than that expressing the bodily resemblances between parents and children (r=.30 to .50, according to Karl Pearson), or between children of the same parents (r=.40 to .60), except in the exceptional case of twins, where the correlation of resemblances is much higher (r=.80 to .90, according to E. L. Thorndike); in these formulas perfect correlation, that is, perfect equivalence or identity, is represented by unity (r=1.00), and total lack of correlation by zero (r=0).

The discovery of "this very high correlation between mentalities of rulers and the conditions of their realms" (p. 247), instead of rousing the author's suspicions and giving him pause, leads him to rush in with enthusiasm where historians fear to tread. As his philosophy of history he contends that (1) the above-mentioned correlation is understandable only on the supposition that the monarch causes the conditions (pp. 247-256); (2) that this is quite natural considering "that modern royalty as a whole has been decidedly superior to the average European in capacity," and that "the chances in favor of royalty [producing men of genius] is several hundred thousand times as great [as those in favor of the common breed of men]" (p. 264); (3) that this superiority of royalty is due to heredity: "royalty, as a result of selection and breeding, has gradually been formed into a distinct sub-variety of the human race, and this process of separation has been going on for centuries"; "there has been a genuine survival of the fittest within the ranks of royalty" (p. 272); and finally (4) that the sharp contrasts between successive good and bad, chaste and licentious, ambitious and indolent monarchs precisely fits in with the Mendelian theory that contrasted "alternative" "unit characteristics" become segregated and are transmitted through the germ-plasm of the germ-cells (gametes) on the "pure," "all or nothing," "present or absent" principle (pp. 269-279). "The true interpretation of history must hinge upon the gametes [of monarchs in the past or of other great men in the present or future], and the laws of history will be found to be but a part of the laws which govern organic life" (p. 303).

As to Mr. Woods's general method, it will have already occurred to the reader that the material on which his work is established is neither simple nor altogether satisfactory. Complex facts like a ruler's mentality or a country's condition do not allow themselves to be easily pigeonholed as +, —, or ±. Historians themselves are not in agreement. Opinions of the past are sometimes reversed by later researches. Adjectives such as "good," "cruel," "licentious," "progressive," which Mr. Woods finds in histories and encyclopædias and on which he bases his "adjective method" of rating, do not have the same precise objective meaning and measuring value as the metric measurements largely employed in anthropometry and biometry. More than this, the author does not appear to be as precise and consistent in his use of words as might be expected of one who places so much reliance on words. In his first chapter he says his rating of monarchs is according to their "intellectual qualities." "Moral traits are, as far as possible, left out of consideration while making up the classification for intellect" (p. 5). This is his theory. But in his practice he continually fails to distinguish carefully mentality, morality, and that tertium quid which is more or less dependent on the combination of the other two, viz., general ability.

As to the author's conclusions, we do not doubt (1) that there is some correlation between the mentality of a ruler and the condition of his country due to the ruler's influence. It is the obvious common-sense conclusion of any one who reads history. But that the amount of this influence has been, or can be, satisfactorily determined by the adjective method and expressed with such mathematical nicety (r=.60 to .70) we gravely doubt. (2) The idea that monarchs are so superior to the common breed of men rests in part on the false assumption that we have material on which to base such a comparison. Simply because of their office, monarchs have always had the limelight of history turned upon them, and whatever abilities they may have had have been recorded—for utilization by Mr. Woods. But no one has recorded the short and simple annals of the poor. Who knows how frequent have been the village Hampdens? In modern times, when the rise of democracy has somewhat diffused the limelight on others than monarchs, and somewhat afforded opportunities for the man of common breed to rise and show his ability as minister beside his monarch, that is, as soon as there does begin to be some basis for comparison, one is surprised at the mental superiority of the ministers over the monarchs. (3) Royalty is, indeed, largely a separate breed, owing to its rules of marriage, but it is not a selective breed within itself nor a result of the survival of the fittest. The breeder selects the best, but primogeniture selects the eldest. The breeder discards the inferior, but royalty mates nearly all its breed, good or bad, in order to secure the succession. In such a breeding system one would expect the breed to deteriorate and consequently tend to die out, which is, we believe, what has taken place. (4) The contrast between successive rulers is not, in fact, so sharp as the author's three-fold rating appears to make it. Nor are biologists agreed that mental ability is wholly determined by gametic inheritance; the influence of environment and education must certainly be taken into account. Experiments in Mendelism so far have dealt chiefly with external and easily analyzed characteristics, such as the color, size, and shape of parts of animals and plants, but not with the complex and elusive problem of mental characteristics. Mental qualities, such as quickness, indolence, cruelty, etc., are not necessarily qualities which correspond to heritable "unit characteristics."

While we cannot wholly endorse the author's method nor accept his conclusions, we strongly advise the historian to read this book; for he will be introduced to fascinating biological methods and theories applied in a field where he himself is familiar with the material and can use his own judgment as to what the experimenter is doing; it is not the usual unfamiliar biological field where the historian must take for granted what other people say they see through the microscope.

Agricultural progress in Canada is assured by the fact that the Government has appropriated $10,000,000 to cover a period of ten years for instruction and research in agriculture. The facilities and equipment of the agricultural colleges will be increased, and agricultural, dairy, and horticultural schools will be established, and agricultural teaching introduced into the public schools. The fund is to be distributed among the provinces according to population.

Petermann's Mitteilungen for September contains articles on the significance of palæographic studies, and on the high Cordilleras of the province of San Juan, Argentina. The future of the International Geographical Congress is discussed by a number of eminent geographers, including Prof. William M. Davis, of Harvard. In the military department the usefulness and extent of air flights in the colonial service are described, and the work of the Rumanian Military Geographical Institute.

Dr. Reginald Heber Fitz, emeritus professor at Harvard of the theory and practice of medicine, died last week in the Corey Hill Hospital, Brookline, Mass. Dr. Fitz was born at Chelsea, Mass., May 5, 1843; received the degree of A.B. from Harvard in 1864, M.D. in 1868, and LL.D. in 1905. He became instructor in pathological anatomy at Harvard in 1870; assistant professor in 1873; professor in 1878; Shattuck professor in 1879; Hersey professor in 1892, and emeritus in 1908. He was the author, with Dr. Horatio C. Wood, of "The Practice of Medicine." For Dr. Fitz it was claimed that an article he wrote in 1886 on what was then known as "perforating ulcer of the vermiform appendix" had much to do with the modern method of treating appendicitis.

Dr. François-Jules Ogier, toxicologist, is dead in Paris. He was born in 1853. Dr. Ogier was vice-president of the Chemical Society of France and a member of the Medical Society of New York. He was for a number of years director of the laboratory of toxicology of the Paris Police Department. A number of scientific treatises bear his name.

Drama

A new volume of "Lyrics and Dramas" from the hand of Stephen Phillips is brought out this week by John Lane Co.

The two most significant incidents of the beginning of the present theatrical season are the farewell engagement of Forbes-Robertson, in the Shubert Theatre, and the reappearance of Julia Marlowe and E. H. Sothern at the Manhattan Opera House. The programmes offered are in the main Shakespearean, and the houses, two of the most capacious in the city, have been filled from floor to roof at every performance. This fact is a sufficient refutation of the ancient pretence of the illiterate commercial managers that there is no longer any active public demand for the literary and poetic drama. The Hamlet of Forbes-Robertson, the most striking interpretation of the character since the days of Henry Irving and Edwin Booth, was received with genuine enthusiasm and a notably quick appreciation of its more subtle beauties. The impersonation—a little more elaborate in detail, perhaps, than of yore, but not materially changed—is too well known to require detailed description. Originality and intellectuality are its distinguishing features. It differs widely from the traditional conception of the part in its rapid, nervous movements, its free gesticulation, and its general suggestion of an alert and energetic spirit, only occasionally subject to fits of melancholy depression. In its carriage and action it fails to emphasize that introspective and speculative side of this extraordinarily complex character which accounts for his vacillation in enterprises of great pith and moment. This Hamlet might be expected actually to sweep to his revenge with wings as swift as meditation or the thoughts of love. But, on the other hand, there can be no question that the animation of manner, the rapid and eloquent changes of facial expression, and the illuminative by-play add greatly to the theatrical charm of the representation, while the delivery of the text, with its perfect clarity, scholarly emphasis, and nice observance of sense and rhythm, is an unfailing delight to the educated ear. Seldom is such elocution heard upon the stage to-day, and in Robertson's case the beauty of vocal art is enhanced by the richness of his organ. Listening to him, some of our younger actors might learn how integral a part of good acting is competent speech. The company which supports him is not brilliant, but the members of it have been well drilled and afford him adequate support. They are also equal, apparently, to the requirements of modern or artificial comedy, as was proved by their work in Madeleine Lucette Ryley's "Mice and Men," in which Gertrude Elliott displayed pleasing vivacity, humor, and sentiment in the conventional theatrical part of the metamorphosed charity girl Peggy. Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson played the part of the kindly old scholar, Mark Embury—whose matrimonial theories work out so unluckily for himself—with firm skill and feeling; but neither the play nor the character is really worthy of his abilities.

The luncheon given in London to F. R. Benson on the eve of his departure from England to begin his tour in Canada and the United States was a notable affair, in which many distinguished representatives of the church, literature, and the stage took part. The principal speech was delivered by Sir Sidney Lee. He proposed the health of Mr. Benson, "whose heroic, strenuous, and disinterested services to the drama had," he said, "placed him very high among his country's benefactors."

Cyril Maude seems to have made a fortunate find in the new play, "Grumpy," by Horace Hodges and Wigney Percival, which he has just produced in Glasgow. It is the story of a very old barrister whose wits are yet sharp enough to solve a criminal problem which has defied younger men.

Music

One of the most noteworthy books in the list of announcements of Thomas Y. Crowell Co. is a handsome edition of Wagner's "Parsifal," illustrated in color by Pogany.

At pretty regular intervals one reads in the morning paper a letter from Constant Reader or Old Subscriber complaining bitterly of the suffering caused by the mediæval abomination of the church bells. It is dreadful to imagine what would have happened to these supersensitives had they lived in Bethnal Green in 1868 and heard the bells of St. Matthew's "ring, in nine hours and twelve minutes, a peal of Kent treble bob major consisting of 15,840 changes," or at Dewsbury in Yorkshire, where four years later "a true peal of Kent treble bob major, consisting of no less than 16,608 changes, was rung in nine hours and fifty minutes." Mr. H. B. Walters, whose book on "Church Bells of England," published by the Oxford University Press (Frowde), is the authority for these extraordinary campanular performances, does not tell us what happened to the long-suffering populations of Bethnal Green and Dewsbury; but he has set forth a vast amount of other interesting information about English bells in a well-ordered and comprehensive treatise. Americans, who as a whole have almost no traditions and very little art or sentiment about bells, will be surprised at the importance and seriousness of the subject for Englishmen, and at the extent of its literature, the bibliography of which occupies twelve pages in Mr. Walters's book. The 384 pages of the text discuss the history of bells and bell-foundries, chiefly in England, technical processes of making, famous great bells, the uses of bells and ceremonies connected with them, the inscriptions upon them, the loss and destruction of bells, and campanology as a pursuit. The chapter on change-ringing will reveal to many astonished readers a most singular sport, quite unknown here, though practiced for two centuries in England, a sport for which, indeed, there exist several incorporated societies of quite venerable age. The combination of sentiment, mathematics, athletics, and noise which it involves is nowhere else to be found.

The scientific side of bell-design and the physical theories of bell-tones and of bell-hanging are not discussed. From the illustrations in the volume one gets an impression of English conservatism in the refusal to lower the trunnions of the yoke to a level anywhere near the centre of gravity, as is done with most American bells; it would be interesting to know whether this is due merely to tradition or to some theory of tone-production, as it inevitably increases greatly the strength required to swing or roll-over the bell. The book has good indexes and lists, and is well printed on very heavy plate paper. It forms one of a series on English churches and church fittings edited by Francis Bond, some of which have been reviewed in these columns.

Max Reger's new "Ballet Suite," which is to have its first performance in New York at a Philharmonic concert, is dedicated to the Philharmonic's conductor, Josef Stransky. That Mr. Stransky has also obtained Richard Strauss's latest piece, "A Festival Prelude," has already been stated. At the opening concert of the Philharmonic, on October 30, Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be on the programme, and Teresa Carreño will be the soloist. In addition to the novelties just named, the Philharmonic programmes will contain a new suite by Victor de Sabate; the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody orchestrated by Anton Seidl, which has not been performed since the death of Seidl fourteen years ago; "Scènes historiques," by Jean Sibelius (new); Heinrich Noren's "Kaleidoscope"; Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony to Dante's "Divina Commedia"; Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"; Haydn's "Military Symphony," and of the Beethoven Symphonies the "Eroica" and Nos. 6 and 8. Bach will be represented in the programmes by the "Brandenburger Concerto" No. 3 and the Bach-Abert Prelude, Choral, and Fugue.

Among the novelties to be performed by the New York Symphony Society this season is a series of tableaux symphoniques by Fanelli, based upon a novel, "La Momie," of Théophile Gautier. The series consists of three musical pictures which are called "Thebes: Before the Palace of Tahoser," "On the Nile," and the "Triumphal Return of Pharaoh." Fanelli is a composer of the modern French school whose works, so long neglected, have but recently been brought before the public, and have made an impression on some musicians. He is said to be a master of orchestration and of color and atmosphere in music.

The Brooklyn series of concerts by the New York Philharmonic Society will again consist of five Sunday afternoons—one each month beginning in November—at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The opening concert will be given with an all-Wagner programme, which will be arranged in chronological order, including extracts from the master's earliest opera, "Rienzi," to "Parsifal." The assisting artists will include Mischa Elman, Teresa Carreño, and Julia Culp. At one of the concerts the patrons will have an opportunity to enjoy the work of several of the solo instruments of the orchestra. The programme of this concert will be arranged to bring forward as soloists several members of the wood-wind choir, and possibly the solo French horn, Xaver Reiter.

Eight years ago attempts were made in Heidelberg to set the fashion of listening to music in a darkened concert hall. The arguments of the promoters of this plan were to the effect that the auditors would listen to the music with greater concentration if all external impressions were removed. "This was all very well in theory, but in practice it was found that the very opposite result was attained," writes Arthur M. Abell in the Musical Courier. "I was present at one of those concerts in Heidelberg, and many persons in the audience testified that the darkness and absence of all attraction for the eye made them drowsy, with the result that they listened to the music with much less attention than under ordinary conditions."

Novelties are to be tabooed by the London Symphony Orchestra, which has issued the following notice: "It has been found necessary to omit from the programmes all other than standard works, as it has been proved by experience that the public support is withdrawn on the occasions when new and unknown works are performed at the concerts, and it is the general wish of the supporters of the concerts to include only works of the standard order."

Paderewski this week has returned after an absence of four years to make an all-season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned, it will be his first tour in five years. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts, and he will be in America until the latter part of April.

Elgar's "Falstaff," one of the orchestral novelties of this season, is analyzed by the composer himself at great length (nine columns) with abundant illustrations in musical type, in the September number of the London Musical Times.

Art

To the "Reminiscences of Augustus Saint-Gaudens," in two royal octavo volumes, which the Century Company issues this week, Mr. Homer Saint-Gaudens has added a considerable amount of the sculptor's correspondence with prominent men.

To the useful series French Artists of Our Day (Lippincott) is added "Gustave Courbet," comprising forty-eight cuts, a brief critical introduction by Léonce Bénédite, and running notes by J. Laran and Ph. Gaston Dreyfus. These notes give a good selection from contemporary criticism and sufficiently recall the controversies which ever accompanied Courbet's stormy course. Since the whole conception of these little volumes is so excellent, it is a pity that the plates are often blurred, as if printed from worn or overinked blocks.

"A Handbook of Modern French Sculpture" (Dodd, Mead), by D. Cady Eaton, is something between a compact dictionary and a collection of critical opinions. In general, the work is done with good sense and taste, and where the author lets himself go, as in the appreciation of Carpeaux, the text is very readable. Hegel's criticism figures largely and cloudily in the preface and appendix. The survey ends with Rodin, a chapter which unfortunately the author was unable to finish. Far too many brief sections on unimportant artists are included. For such minutiæ the special student will naturally consult French encyclopædic works, and the layman may well dispense with such information. Since the field is swept so fully, that exquisite draftsman, Jean Carriès, should not have been ignored. There is a useful list of the works of sculpture on the Opera and the Grand and Petit Palais. The book shows close study of the topic, but the author reveals little knowledge of sculpture in general; hence his work is deficient in sidelights and critical analogies.

Sir Aurel Stein has been deputed by the Indian Government to resume his archæological and geographical explorations in Central Asia and westernmost China, the results of which he published in "Ruins of Desert Cathay." In his journey to the Pamirs he will pass through territories which have not been previously visited by a European.

Numerous small excavations have been carried on in Greece during the past season. At Athens the Greek Archæological Society has excavated on the Pnyx in order to discover the extent and construction of the containing wall east of the Bema. In Bœotia M. Soteriadis has continued his prehistoric excavations in the neighborhood of Chæroncia. In Crete M. Hazidakis has continued, with excellent results, his excavation of the prehistoric Cretan town, of Late Minoan date, at Tylissos, near Candia. Sir Arthur Evans has conducted several small excavations in the Palace of Knossos to test his earlier conclusions, and the British School has completely cleared the Kamares Cave on Mount Ida, in which had previously been found the deposit of Middle Minoan pottery from which the so-called "Kamares Ware" derived its name.

Finance

THE BANKERS' CONVENTION AND THE BANKING BILL.

The annual Convention of the American Bankers' Association opened at Boston on Wednesday morning. It assembled at an unusually interesting moment; for the new banking and currency bill, having passed the House of Representatives, is now in the hands of the Senate Committee, whence it will in due course be reported to the Senate with such alterations as the Committee may decide upon. Formal discussion of the measure by the bankers has been largely based, on this occasion, on the report of the currency committee appointed by the last Convention. That report was framed and published at the conference of the committee, on August 22 and 23, with representatives of the State bankers' associations and clearing house associations. It recommended numerous changes in the House banking bill as it stood at that time.

Some of these recommendations, such as reduction in the reserves as originally stipulated for individual banks in the national system, have subsequently been adopted by the House and incorporated in its bill. Others, and the greater number, have not been thus adopted. These other proposed alterations are naturally the focus of this week's Convention discussion.

The main objections of the bankers' currency committee to the present bill were these: Membership of existing national banks in the new banking system should be permissive, not mandatory. The National Board of Supervision, known in the Act as the Federal Reserve Board, should consist, not of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Controller of the Currency, and four other members chosen by the President of the United States, but of the Secretary of the Treasury, three members named by the President, and three chosen by the regional reserve banks. The power conferred by the bill on the Federal Board, of requiring one regional bank to rediscount paper held by another, was objected to; permissive power only was recommended.

All references to the note issues as obligations of the United States were opposed. Instead of conditioning such issues on application by the regional bank to the Federal Reserve Board, on the consent or veto of such application by that national board, and on payment of such "rate of interest" on the note issues as the Board shall require, the bankers' committee proposed that "any Federal reserve bank, upon vote of its directors, and within a limit prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, may issue such amount of the notes hereinbefore provided for as it may deem best." Instead of the bill's requirement that a reserve of 33 1-3 per cent. shall be carried, in gold or lawful money, against the note issues of any regional bank, it is proposed that a 40 per cent. reserve of gold alone be maintained, without tax upon the notes; but that when such reserve falls below this ratio, a progressive tax rising to 4½ per cent. shall be imposed, and that no further issues shall be permitted when the reserve is down to 33 1-3 per cent.

It will be observed that these criticisms converged on two separate lines—the wisdom of certain existing provisions from an administrative point of view, and the wisdom of others from an economic point of view. The first has chiefly to do with the composition of the Federal Reserve Board; whether it shall consist wholly of Administration officers and Administration appointees, or whether three of the seven members shall be named by the regional banks.

The bankers' conference committee did not propose, as did the Aldrich plan, a majority of bankers or banking representatives in the Board; therefore their argument rests mainly on the contention that the banks in the system ought not to be dominated, so far as regards the national supervision, by a body exclusively made up of political appointees. The House bill has endeavored to meet this argument by creating a Federal advisory council, with one representative from each regional bank, having the power of conferring at any time with the Federal Board and of calling for information, but not the power of overruling decisions of the Board. All this raises the interesting question, which of the two expedients would be the surer protection against possible evils of political domination—a minority in the Federal Board itself, or an advisory body with distinct official powers of recommendation and criticism.

Mandatory membership of national banks in the proposed new system was objected to as an infringement on the charter rights of existing banks. This is to some extent offset by the power of national banks to reorganize under a State system—a power handicapped, however, by their holdings of United States bonds which, after such reorganization, would no longer be available for purposes of note issue. The chairman of the Senate Committee has intimated his willingness to make the membership permissive. This phase of the question is one of the most delicate of all; for the Government is naturally as anxious not to risk the failure of its plan through unwillingness of banks, their shareholders, and their depositors, to participate, as the banks could be not to risk the complications of an ill-judged system.

The bankers are absolutely sound in their objection to the language describing the notes as obligations of the Government. These are not Government issues, even when judged by the provisions of the House bill, and it is both misleading and mischievous so to describe them. The provision for an arbitrary tax on such circulation, which the bill calls a "rate of interest," is in principle wholly objectionable. Both paragraphs are admittedly in the nature of compromise with the ideas of radicals, who are placated by language which, by inference at all events, says what it does not mean. The fact remains, however, that the general provisions of the pending bill, for insuring the soundness, elasticity, and prompt redemption of the notes, are thoroughly good, and a vast improvement on the Aldrich plan. The respective merits of the fixed ratio of reserve against the notes, in the House bill, and the elastic ratio with a non-taxable minimum in the bankers proposed alternative, are a legitimate matter for discussion.

The question whether the Federal Board, however constituted, should have power to require one regional bank to discount paper for another is unquestionably difficult. Mr. Paul Warburg, writing on the bill in the current North American Review, takes the ground that such power is inevitable, if the harmonious working of the entire structure is to be insured; yet he also holds that arbitrary and unrestricted authority of that nature would be fatal to the existence of a free and natural open discount market throughout the country. Certainly the real crux of controversy lies less in the composition of the Federal Board (granting the Government's supremacy) than in the nature and judicious limitation of its powers.

Chicago and the Old Northwest

By MILO M. QUAIFE

This book is in scope and subject-matter a history. But in language and content it is as thrillingly interesting as romance. It is a history of the founding of old Fort Dearborn at the mouth of the Chicago River at the time when the modern metropolis of Chicago was but a wilderness hunted over by Indians. It describes the "Fort Dearborn massacre," the contest of the British and Americans for the Indian trade of the great Northwest, and the Indian wars, massacres, and frontier experiences which figured in the development of Chicago. The work is the most absorbingly interesting contribution to the history of the Northwest that has appeared in years.

Reminiscences of a Soldier's Wife

Is Both Biography and Autobiography.

Mrs. John A. Logan

In Recounting Her Own Eventful Career from Pioneer Days in Illinois, Gives a Life of Her Celebrated Husband.

The writer's youth before her early marriage was passed in a pioneer community — Southern Illinois — of which she gives a graphic social picture, and her experiences since General Logan's death have been many and varied. But more than generally happens, she was her husband's constant companion: she describes with a vivacious pen his youthful political successes, the important part he took in the Civil War, in the early events of which she herself actively shared, and his subsequent service as congressman-at-large and senator from Illinois, commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, candidate for the Vice-Presidency, and one of the leading spirits in his party's councils.

A NEW WORK

By William J. Long

AMERICAN LITERATURE

The publication of an American Literature by William J. Long is an assurance that the student of literature will find a new book that is readable and accurate. The new and refreshing manner in which Mr. Long handles this subject is exemplified in his well-known "English Literature." In distinction from many other books on American literature, this new work is emphatically national, recognizing no political or geographical boundaries to the national spirit.

The price of the book is $1.35. Copies may be procured from the publishers, Ginn and Company, through their offices in Boston, New York, Chicago, Atlanta, Dallas, Columbus, San Francisco, and London.

JUST PUBLISHED

THE ART OF WRITING ENGLISH

By Rollo Walter Brown, Professor of Rhetoric and Composition, Wabash College; and Nathaniel Waring Barnes, Professor of English Composition, De Pauw University.

$1.20

In this book for college classes, the student is led at the outset to recognize that he must have something worth while to say when he writes: then he considers in turn the words he will use; the principles which will guide him in his expression; the several steps, as he actually writes; and finally, the testing of his finished product. Later he takes up the problems peculiar to special kinds of writing. Without neglecting the writing which is "literary," the book gives full attention to the kinds commonly demanded in daily life, thus bringing the study close to every student. Though the book does not aim to be entertaining at the expense of substance, it is written in fresh, simple, concrete language, without wornout technical phraseology and rhetorical jargon.

LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF

WendellPhillipsGarrison

Editor of The Nation 1865–1906

In one volume, crown 8vo, 500 pages, with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned by the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations between Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, besides a fine photogravure portrait.

NEW BOOKS

CHICAGO AND THE OLD NORTHWEST, 1673-1835. By MILO M. QUAIFE, Professor of History in the Lewis Institute of Technology.

This book recounts, in a manner at once scholarly and dramatic, the early history of Chicago. From the point of view of Chicago and the Northwest alone, the work is local in character, although the locality concerned embraces five great states of the Union; in the larger sense its interest is as broad as America, for every foot of America has been at some time on the frontier of civilization.

470 pages. 8vo, cloth. $4.23 postpaid.

ANIMAL COMMUNITIES IN TEMPERATE AMERICA, AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE CHICAGO REGION. By VICTOR E. SHELFORD, Instructor in Zoology in the University of Chicago.

This volume presents the principles of field ecology illustrated by the more widely distributed animal habitats of the eastern half of temperate North America, and the aquatic habitats of a much larger territory. Six chapters deal with general principles. In several chapters the animal communities are considered from the point of view of modern dynamic ecology. A valuable feature of the book is the three hundred figures of widely distributed animals chosen to represent the chief types of animal communities and their characteristic modes of life.

380 pages. 8vo, cloth. $3.22 postpaid.

ARTIFICIAL PARTHENOGENESIS AND FERTILIZATION. By JACQUES LOEB, Member of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

This new work presents the first complete treatment of the subject of artificial parthenogenesis in English. It gives an account of the methods by which unfertilized eggs can be caused to develop by physico-chemical means, and the conclusions which can be drawn from them concerning the mechanism by which the spermatozoon induces development. Since the problem of fertilization is connected with so many problems of physiology and pathology, the bearing of the facts recorded and discussed in the book goes beyond the special problem indicated by the title.

318 pages. 12mo, cloth. $2.68 postpaid.

A MANUAL FOR WRITERS. By JOHN M. MANLY, Head of the Department of English in the University of Chicago, and JOHN A. POWELL, of the University of Chicago Press.

A book designed to aid authors and all others who are concerned with the writing of English. It aims to answer the practical questions that constantly arise in the preparation of manuscripts for the printer, business letters, and any sort of composition where correctness of form is an important element.

It treats in a clear and convenient way the matters of grammar, spelling, and general form which writers need most to be informed about, and gives full directions on the preparation of "copy" for the printer and the correcting of proof. The chapter on letter-writing is unique and gives just the help that is constantly wanted and that other manuals deny.

224 pages. 12mo, cloth. $1.35 postpaid.

LONDON IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By PERCY H. BOYNTON, Assistant Professor of English Literature in the University of Chicago.

This volume deals with ten consecutive periods, characterized in turn by the work and spirit of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb, Dickens, and by the qualities of Victorian and contemporary London. The temper of each epoch is discussed, and then in particular those literary works which are intimately related to certain localities in London. The work contains four maps and forty-three other illustrations, selected from the best of a great fund of material.

358 pages. 8vo, cloth. $2.17 postpaid.

MATERIALS FOR THE STUDY OF ELEMENTARY ECONOMICS. By LEON CARROLL MARSHALL, CHESTER WHITNEY WRIGHT, and JAMES ALFRED FIELD, of the Department of Political Economy in the University of Chicago.

This volume of nearly a thousand pages is intended to supply to students of elementary economics a collection of readings, illustrating the working of economic principles in actual life. The material is drawn from the most various sources—books, magazines, newspapers, commission reports, court decisions, corporation charters, government circulars, etc. The selections have been carefully edited, so as to eliminate unsuitable material and present the documents in the most usable form.

946 pages. 8vo, cloth. $3.00 postpaid. Special Library Edition, $4.80 postpaid.

CHRISTIAN FAITH FOR MEN OF TO-DAY. By E. ALBERT COOK, Professor of Systematic Theology in the Congregational College of Canada.

This volume contains a clear and reasonable interpretation of life from the Christian point of view, and some definite formulation of those beliefs that have proved most effectual in the development of individual character and in the promotion of the welfare of society. The convenient arrangement of the material in numbered paragraphs, the valuable appendices, and the general systematic treatment of the subject commend the book as a popular text for college men and women, and for adult classes and clubs, as well as for general reading.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1913.

The Week

It is with regret that supporters of the Wilson Administration who believe, with the Nation, that the waste of the people's money for battleships is indefensible, will read that the Administration appears about committed to a three-battleship programme. If the President really consents to this he will go counter to the opinion of his party as expressed in the last Congress, by which the money waste was held down to one battleship; and he will go the Taft Administration one better. Its appeal was for only two ships, and yet it represented the jingo and imperialistic forces in the country. If the Democrats now abandon their historic policy of a small armament, on Mr. Wilson's advice, they should at least give to the country clear and specific reasons why some forty millions of dollars should be taken for this purpose. There is no real cloud in sight on the horizon of our foreign politics, unless it be the Mexican imbroglio, and for any such emergency we now have battleships enough. For us to plunge ahead at the rate of three ships a year will be further to alarm South America and stir up suspicion and anxiety across both the oceans.

The Senate's postponement of the Hetch Hetchy park question to the regular session of Congress is so much to the good; but it will be very little to the good unless the opponents of the scheme make use of the interval in the most energetic and effective manner possible. One thing that would be extremely helpful is the preparation of a thoroughgoing report on the subject by some expert or experts of acknowledged authority on the question of landscape beauty as well as of water-supply. This would require money, and the money would have to be raised quickly; but the amount would be trifling in comparison with the object at stake, and an instant appeal in the right quarters ought to be immediately successful. In the meanwhile it is gratifying to note the emphatic stand which the influential press of the country is taking on the subject. To its protest, and that of a few individual workers, must be ascribed the success thus far attained in resisting the scheme of spoliation.

In handsome spirit Mr. Taft has urged support of the Wilson Administration, and expressed his hope that there is no one who does not wish the present Government to succeed in benefiting all the people. "I don't mind," he is quoted as saying, "seeing Congress brought under a rule that carries through what that party promised." In other words, he finds no fault with Mr. Wilson's personal efforts to induce the Democrats in Congress to live up to their pledges. Those alarmed at Mr. Wilson's holding Congress up to its tasks are, we think, chiefly concerned lest the President should fail to take competent advice. Thus the bankers feel that because of the President's desire to keep his Administration free from any Wall Street alliance, he fails to realize the value of their expert advice on the currency bill, and mistakenly feels that they are hostile to him and all his plans. So in other fields the anxiety is not lest he should act as party leader mapping out a programme, but, in the rush of the exhausting business of the White House, lest he should hear but one side of a problem. There is a tradition, too, that he failed to take counsel sufficiently at Princeton. On the other hand, it must be remembered that no President has consulted more freely with Senators and Congressmen than has Mr. Wilson, notably on the Mexican question.

In Massachusetts the speeches of the gubernatorial candidates have called attention to a situation that has its parallel in New Jersey, and that throws an interesting light on the workings of the direct primaries in those States. It is what the Boston and Springfield press calls "the platform anarchy," and the New Jersey papers "the platform tangle." Each candidate ran for party nomination this summer on his own platform. When the conventions met after the primaries, the platforms they laid down differed widely, in some cases, from those upon which the nominees had stood. The differences were perceptible in the cases of Mr. Fielder and Mr. Stokes, of New Jersey, but it is Congressman Gardner, of Massachusetts, who has taken the most decisive stand. He repudiates the Republican platform because it omits the four measures which he advocated, and he has given notice that he will not speak at party rallies unless he is permitted to defend them. Logically, exception can easily be taken to his attitude. So many Republicans may have been swayed by his personality, or by a portion of his political creed, that he can scarcely claim in his nomination an unqualified endorsement of his whole platform. The provision of the Massachusetts and New Jersey laws, moreover, that when a party chooses its nominee it chooses also delegates who shall express its political faith, recognizes a party solidarity which Mr. Gardner's emphasis of his personal views opposes.

Cocaine was so clearly the cause of a recent "race riot" at Harriston, Miss., as to lead to some frank editorial utterances in regard to it. Thus the Columbia, S. C., State wonders why the "consistent and thoughtful (!) lyncher" does not in such a case think of lynching also the person who sold the drug to the cocaine-crazed negro boys who killed the seven citizens of Harriston. The Memphis Commercial-Appeal also admits that the law against the sale of cocaine is a dead-letter; that its violation is "one of the greatest curses of the Southland," and that it often is responsible for a "frenzied lunacy." It quotes a physician as declaring that there is enough cocaine sold in Memphis every day "to supply the legitimate use of physicians and surgeons for five years." The Mobile Register declares that the sale of cocaine to negroes is a crime against society as well as against the law. Unfortunately, the constant convictions in this city for the illegal sale of cocaine, show clearly that the evil is not confined to the South or to one race. The whole question of the stopping of this traffic is of the utmost moment everywhere, for of late it has been gaining ground with startling rapidity.

The Indian problem, in the opinion of those interested, is presenting phases that make it more critical than ever before. "In the trail of graft," says a bulletin announcing the annual Lake Mohonk Conference, "has gone poverty, and with poverty has gone an increase in disease until the Indian possessed of the land rightfully his and unaffected with either tuberculosis or trachoma is, indeed, a fortunate individual." Wholesale defrauding of the Indians in Oklahoma is to claim the attention of the Conference. During the last two years, the growing prominence of that State has brought to notice gigantic frauds that have been and still are perpetrated upon great numbers of Indian children and adults. Probate matters are invaded by the greedy white man, who influences the appointment of guardians, and in hundreds of cases leaves unsuspecting children to arrive at maturity with little or none of the land and money that should have been theirs. Much of the process is disguised under the color of law. Local sentiment, in Oklahoma as in other places, inclines towards the defrauder.

The infinite variety of forms under which "graft" may appear has received fresh illustration at Dayton, O., where the State Accounting Bureau has been making an investigation. Nearly a hundred dollars, it discovers, was paid by the city for Sunday newspapers, which were enjoyed by the Mayor, the Solicitor, the members of the Election Board, and other officials. It seems strange that public officers should grudge a few nickels for so well-recognized an instrument of instruction and culture as the Sunday newspaper, but satisfaction is not necessarily proportioned to expenditure. As Dayton's rulers waded through section after section of the bundles of printed matter which the newsboys left at their doors on Sunday morning, while their rooms gradually became a disordered sea of literature, they must have felt themselves to be grafters of the first order. "All these comic pictures, all these colored supplements," they must have whispered to themselves, "for the asking!" After that, over-charges for medical services, seventy dollars for a couple of gold badges, and retention of fees that belonged to the city, probably seemed moderation itself.

The reprinting of Senator Tillman's cow cartoon in the Congressional Record reminds us how much the world has lost by the conservatism of Government printing offices. What the Senator from South Carolina said eighteen years ago about Wall Street and the Supreme Court may have become dim in the public mind, but a glance at the cow, feeding on the farms of the South and West, but giving her golden milk to the East, should be enough to arouse a free people to its duty. What a pity it was that the prosecutors of Warren Hastings did not have the ingenuity to publish the drawing of a cow, feeding on the principalities of India, and pouring all of the milk into Hastings's desk in Calcutta. Or if Sir Robert Peel, instead of listening to Disraeli's excoriation, had sent for a cartoonist, and when his foe had finished, had quietly asked the House of Commons for leave to print in Hansard the drawing which he held in his hand—would not Dizzy's fate have been sealed then and there?

Not even the tragedy of the Titanic surpassed in dramatic quality the end of the Volturno. At least, there was never before on the ocean such a scene as that of Thursday night—a great steamer burning helplessly in a gale, which prevented the safe launching of lifeboats, with ten or eleven ocean liners rolling in the high seas near by in the hope that the gale might abate in time to save some of the hundreds of lives menaced by the waves and by fire. There was no hanging back this time by possible rescuers, and a Cunarder was again in the lead in bringing aid and comfort. Evidently, the Carmania was handled with rare skill, and for all the ships, the night spent in such close proximity in so great a gale must have been one to try the souls of those who stood on the bridges. Finally, about the happiest man in the world to-day should be Marconi. To make a wonderful, epoch-creating scientific discovery is one thing; to behold it put into practical operation is another; but to live to see the almost weekly saving of lives by it, with the totals running into the thousands—that must make a man feel singularly favored of fortune.

Like undergraduate, like people. The senior class of Cornell has voted upon the question of serving liquors at its class functions, and the result is a drawn battle between the "wets" and the "drys." Liquors will be permitted on the boat ride and on "senior nights," but not at the banquet or any other affairs except the two named. Could there be a more faithful reflection of the action of the parents and friends of these students? One year ten Massachusetts towns go "wet." The next, six of them go "dry." The third, four of these six go "wet" again. Tennessee passes a State prohibition law, and then its Governor has a fight to get supplementary legislation that will make the law enforceable. Maine, too, after decades of ostensible prohibition, with the word written in her Constitution, is so evenly divided in an election on the subject that it requires days to ascertain what she thinks about it now.

Fewer and better books—who would not say yes to this innovation? And when this proposal comes from a publisher, as it recently has come, and not merely from a critic or philosopher, our hearts beat high with hope. Moreover, there is tact in the initial step suggested. Parents are to be appealed to, not on their own account, but on that of their children. This should take well. No one wishes to be restricted in his own reading, but every one is unselfish enough to be willing to prescribe for others. And children are peculiarly susceptible to such prescription. Their elders are generally agreed that trash is not for immature minds. Youth is the time for association with Plato and Burke and Voltaire. When one becomes a man, one seeks out Hall Caine and Mrs. Barclay and Robert W. Chambers. Yet a cautious move is to be made in the direction of influencing the mature. Book exhibits are planned, showing the best books that have appeared during the preceding twelvemonth. But who is to decide what are the best books, and upon what principles is the choice to be made? As to this we are not informed, but surely there can be nothing better than a best-seller. To say anything else, every publisher will assure us, is to question the intelligence of the reading public.

Another terrible blow for the hard-headed expert—this time in Mexico.

Those practical, well-informed, dispassionate "observers" of Mexican conditions, who criticised President Wilson's policy towards Huerta as one of childish sentimentality and mistaken ethics, in antagonism with the "facts," are now under the necessity of admitting the painfully insubstantial nature of their "facts." Repeatedly we have protested in these columns against the superstition which confounds brutality with efficiency. Because a successful dictator, like Porfirio Diaz, must be ruthless in his policies, people embrace the converse of the proposition and assume that crime and violence are the proofs of efficient despotism. Because Huerta attained power through a succession of acts of revolting perfidy and outrage, very respectable people jumped at the conclusion that Huerta must be the heaven-sent man for Mexico. It would have been sentimental to look beneath the surface of things, to try to ascertain whether the democratic uprising that drove Diaz from power had really spent itself, or whether Madero's death did not altogether extinguish the spirit of resistance to despotism. But President Wilson did look beneath the surface. A pleasant time we should be having to-day with Huerta enjoying our official approval, playing the dictator, and, in spite of it, nearing his downfall.

The defeat of a Liberal candidate in a Quebec bye-election last Saturday has naturally been taken as a victory by Canadian protectionists; but the renewed energy it has given to the Laurier campaign for lower tariff rates is worthy of the attention of Americans. The reduction of the tariff which the Liberals advocate would directly affect the price of foodstuffs across the border. Especial emphasis is laid upon the necessity for the removal of the present duty upon wheat and flour; and if these are once placed on the Canadian free list, they can enter the United States free. It is upon the growing desire of the western provinces for free admission of their products into the United States that Sir Wilfrid Laurier rests his confidence, as he faces the coming struggle. An issue of great interest for the United States, therefore, promises to be clearly fought out in the next few months. How important it may become is indicated in Sir Wilfrid's assertion that in time it will lead to a resubmission of the reciprocity question.

No plainer intimation that the Asquith Government is willing to listen to reason on Home Rule could be given than in the words employed at Dundee by Winston Churchill. The declaration began, as a matter of fact, with a reaffirmation of the Government's resolve to enact a Home Rule bill establishing a separate Parliament and Executive for Ireland. But any changes within that scheme which Ulster might demand the Government is willing to consider. Whether it is prepared to go so far as to discuss the exclusion of Ulster from the operation of the bill, Mr. Churchill naturally did not say; this would be giving the Liberal case away at the beginning. What he did hint at was that time would allay the fears of the Ulster men regarding the attitude of a Dublin Parliament towards the Protestants of the North. Mr. Churchill pointed out that the Irish Parliament cannot begin functioning yet for two years. Before that happens there will be a general election in the United Kingdom. If the Liberals are beaten, their opponents can repeal Home Rule if they like. If the Liberals win, Ulster must be prepared to yield. But with two years to talk reason in, why all the fulminating about armed resistance?

The report that the British Miners' Federation has urged its leaders to "approach the executives of other large trade unions with a view to coöperative action in support of each other's demands" follows on the proposal among employers for a Defence Union, with a guarantee fund of $250,000,000. This, however, came to little. Yet the plan to amalgamate unions may be partly intended as a response to the scheme of the employers. British railway workers of all grades have combined in one body, as have British post office employees. The recent Dublin transport workers' strike is illustrative of the ill feeling generated when a local dispute involves outer zones of federated laborers or employers. The logical results of this extension of coöperative action, on either side, have often been pointed out. The purpose of the strike, the settlement of a definitely drawn issue, is lost sight of. Good and bad employees suffer alike, though none suffer so much as the unoffending public. It is in the partial, not the general strike, in the words of the Edinburgh Review, that "the public continues to be served, while the recalcitrant employer sees his business diverted to his rival."

Prince Katsura, who died on Friday of last week, will be mourned by most of his countrymen with conflicting emotions. To the Conservative Cabinet which he headed belongs the credit of the Russian war, and of Japan's greatest diplomatic victory—the treaty with England in 1902 and its renewal in 1905. Distinguished by patriotism and ability, Katsura's career in that period links him with the generals and sea captains who brought Japan into the front rank of the Powers. But the submergence of his party in the rising wave of Constitutionalism, and the revolt against military burdens, showed that his methods had become obsolete. The mass meetings and riots of recent days defeated the attempt to restore him to power, and left no doubt as to the popular attitude towards his principles.

Within the space of a few days, China has seen one troubling question after another disposed of, and the way made clear for an epoch of national appeasement and reconstruction. A President of the Republic has been chosen in the person of Yuan Shi-Kai, whose election was foreseen, but against whom a strong feeling of opposition nevertheless manifested itself. That is one uncertainty removed. The new President signalizes the beginning of his term with the suppression of a formidable uprising in the south; so that in the country at large, as in Parliament, he will henceforth work with a free hand. The Japanese crisis has been surmounted. Finally, the ghost of the famous six-Power loan has been laid, and the reorganization of China's finances can be taken up, perhaps under no very bright auspices, but freed at least from this particularly subtle bit of international wire-pulling which has for years confused the entire situation. Having thus vindicated its authority against domestic sedition, and foreign intrigue and intimidation, the Government of Yuan Shi-Kai bids fair to enjoy something of a respite in which to show just what it can do.

WILSON AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Governor-General Harrison's address on assuming office at Manila has, so far as we have observed, met with little censure on the score of its being in any way revolutionary. On the contrary, a number of newspapers that are upholders of the Republican party's policy and record in relation to the Philippines have found fault with that declaration of the present Administration's attitude on quite the opposite ground. After all the fuss the Democrats made over imperialism, they say, when the party was out of power, all that the emissary of a Democratic President can do, when he makes a solemn announcement of the Administration's position, is just to repeat what Republican Presidents and their representatives have been saying these many years past. "Ultimate independence" is what President McKinley—after his first unfortunate break about "benevolent assimilation"—and President Roosevelt and President Taft have all been pointing towards; and "ultimate independence" is all that Mr. Harrison promises in the name of President Wilson. It is true that he lays stress on the element of time; but, after all, an end towards which "we hope to move," and that not at a specified rate but "as rapidly as the safety and the permanent interests of the islands will permit," is an end the realization of which can be put off to the Greek Kalends if we choose. So that, if there were nothing in the matter but these words spoken by Mr. Harrison on behalf of the President, those critics would not be far wrong who pooh-pooh the Governor-General's announcement as little more than empty sound.

Some voices, however, have been raised in angry denunciation of that same announcement as an assumption of unconstitutional power. The Tribune of New York came out with an editorial under the head, "By What Authority Could our Sovereignty of the Philippines be Renounced?" The Governor-General, it declared, "stands self-convicted of one of two things. Either he seeks to arrogate to himself or to the President authority which is vested exclusively in Congress, or he is making promises to the Filipinos which he knows he has no right to make and which he knows neither he nor the President has any power to fulfil."

The Chicago Inter Ocean takes an even more tragical view of the matter. "All thinking Americans," it says, "must necessarily inquire by what authority Woodrow Wilson, the 42 per cent. plurality President, thus assumes to dispose of thousands of square miles of the national domain—of lands which the American people have added to their dominions with the expenditure of their treasure and with the blood of their sons!" And even this does not suffice. The crime which the President has prospectively committed is not only an alienation of blood-bought dominions; it is to be classed with disruption of the Union itself:

> Fifty years ago we were fighting the greatest war in history to prevent a portion of our national dominions from becoming "independent" of the rest. We spent billions of money and sacrificed a million lives to stop "secession"—to stop exactly what Woodrow Wilson, through his appointee, now promises to foster in the Philippines.

When a position is assailed by opponents who look at it from the same point of view, and yet find fault for diametrically opposite reasons, there is fair ground for suspecting that there is something wrong about both criticisms. What that is in this case there is no great difficulty in pointing out. Those who complain that the promise of "ultimate independence" at some unnamed time in the future is only what Republican Administrations have been holding out, overlook the fact that in such a matter the spirit behind the promise is everything. All the world knows that Mr. Wilson and the Democratic party really wish to promote in every possible way the fulfilment of that promise, while the world knew nothing of the kind, and believed nothing of the kind, in regard to the Republican Administrations. On the other hand, those who talk of Gov. Harrison's address as meaning either cession or secession overlook the fact that the greatest care was taken to prevent the announcement from being capable of any such interpretation. Not to speak of the guarded language we have already quoted, there was more than one expression in what Mr. Harrison personally added to the words of his instructions that served to emphasize the tentative character of the Administration's programme. "I remind you," he said, "that we are for the present responsible before the world for your welfare and progress. Until your independence is complete we shall demand unremitting recognition of our sovereignty." The whole address was as distinctly marked by caution and conservatism as by a sincere and energetic purpose to move towards Philippine independence.

The truth is that, while the Wilson-Harrison announcement marks out no new path, it does constitute a notable landmark upon the path we have been pursuing, with more or less steadiness, these fifteen years. A backward glance over that journey furnishes matter for much gratification. The attitude that was dominant in the earliest days of our venture into imperialism has almost wholly disappeared. Such a view as that expressed by the Inter Ocean is to-day interesting only as a curiosity. The little band of aggressive anti-imperialists have been the subject of much ridicule; but their doctrine, though it did not prevail, has profoundly influenced the national temper. Little by little, the idea of "dominion," however qualified by benevolent purpose, has faded out, and the benevolent purpose alone has remained as the avowed object of the nation. "Benevolent assimilation" very soon took its place as a notion odious to the American people, a phrase to be forgotten as completely as possible. The principles of the Declaration of Independence, lightly flouted in the first flush of conquest, gradually resumed their rightful place in the thought of the nation. The idea that the flag must "stay put" in the Philippines as a matter of national honor has given way to the conviction that the highest honor the nation can acquire there is that of having vindicated its good name by relinquishment of our dominion when its professed purpose had been accomplished. It may be said, almost literally, that every year since 1899 has seen an advance along this path.

BLOOD ACCUSATION.

The trial at Kiev, the ancient religious capital of Russia, of the Jewish workingman, Mendel Beiliss, on the charge of murdering a young Christian boy in connection with the celebration of the Jewish Passover, bids fair to run the same course as the most famous blood-ritual trial of modern times, that of Tisza-Eszlar in Hungary thirty-one years ago. Except in one important feature. At Tisza-Eszlar the court was in session for six weeks before the monstrous conspiracy was exposed with such dramatic completeness that the public prosecutor was compelled to withdraw from the case. At Kiev the trial is hardly under way, and already its collapse is regarded as imminent, notwithstanding the furious onslaught on the judicial authorities by the leading anti-Semitic organ of that city. In that extraordinary document there is no attempt to mince words. The authorities are excoriated for their failuro in the conduct of what turns out to be, not the trial of an individual for murder, but a campaign having for its object the fixing of a hideous charge upon the Jewish people, with immediate results in the shape of pogrom and massacre, and permanent results in the continuation and strengthening of the policy of inhuman oppression under which the Jews labor to-day in "constitutional" Russia.

The methods of judicial procedure that obtain on the Continent generally were favorable to the designs of the "Black Hundred." The elaborate magistrate's examination is in reality a trial before the real trial, at least so far as the public is concerned. It was during such preliminary proceedings, when the accused enjoys few of the guarantees of justice which even the Russian Government accords to the defendant in open court, that the fomenters of race-hatred had their opportunity. Their evil accusations were cast abroad without being subjected to the test of cross-examination. It was before the actual trial occurred that the anti-Semitic leaders expected to reap the first fruits of their campaign. If the passions of the Russian mob could not be stirred before the convening of the court, there was small chance that the desired result would be attained when the taking and testing of testimony began and the fabric of vicious falsehood was exposed. For more than two years Mendel Beiliss has been in prison awaiting trial. If no anti-Jewish uprising occurred in that time, the "Black Hundred" was bound to recognize that the game was up.

The indictment as presented in open court at Kiev makes interesting reading; especially to lawyers, wo imagine. Instead of trying to show that there had been a murder, that the accused Beiliss was the murderer, and that his motives were religious, the document sets out to demonstrate the existence of a blood ritual among the Jews. In support of its contention it can rally the authority of a professor of mental pathology at Kiev University and a Catholic priest. The indictment admits that two other experts to whom the question was referred declared against the existence of such a ritual. So weak is the Government's own case by confession, it can hardly be necessary to enter here into a detailed résumé of the overwhelming mass of testimony that has been gathered in the course of centuries to disprove the existence of any basis for this accusation. Christian scholars and ecclesiastics have been at pains to refute this slander against a whole people. The two most convincing presentations of the subject are by a German Catholic priest, F. Frank, who published "Der Ritualmord" some ten years ago, and by a Lutheran clergyman and scholar, Hèrman L. Strack, professor of theology at Berlin University. The latter enumerates a long list of Papal bulls, from Innocent IV in the thirteenth century to Clement XIII in the eighteenth century, denouncing the blood accusation against the Jews as false and malicious. But, unfortunately, such appeals to reason are addressed to men of enlightenment and education who are in no need of being convinced. The Russian peasant today, like the Hungarian peasant of thirty years ago, does not come into touch with the writings of Berlin professors.

And so in Russia to-day the procedure of the accusers is the same as in Hungary thirty years ago. The case has its rise in political and racial animosity. It aims to rouse the passions of the crowd; and when it is forced to run the gantlet of judicial examination, it collapses. At Tisza-Eszlar the principal witness for the prosecution was the fourteen-year-old son of one of the defendants. He was frightened into submission and coached for his rôle by the police. His cross-examination brought out the truth. At Kiev the principal witness for the prosecution is a little girl of nine, who pretends to have received her information of the crime from her sister and her brother, both of whom have been dead these two years. The brother was seven at the time of the alleged murder. No wonder that the leaders of the True Russians are furious with the Prosecuting Attorney, or that in exalted quarters at St. Petersburg, where interest in the case has been displayed, it has been recognized for some time that the accusation of ritual murder ought to be dropped and an attempt made to convict Beiliss as an ordinary assassin.

The disappointment of the leaders of the "Black Hundred" with the showing made by the judicial and police authorities at Kiev must be all the more poignant because in that city, if anywhere in Russia, the police might be expected to prove itself efficient. A little more than two years ago Prime Minister Stolypin was assassinated at Kiev in the presence of the Czar. The part played by the police authorities on that occasion has remained one of those subjects which in Russia are investigated and allowed to disappear from public notice. After the removal of a Prime Minister, the manufacture of a ritual murder case ought to have been a simple task. The editor of the anti-Semitic Kievlianin is justified in charging gross incompetence.

THE BILLBOARD PLAGUE.

A report of first-rate importance is that made by the Billboard Advertising Commission of New York appointed by Mayor Gaynor last December. It is the result of painstaking inquiry and of competent thought. It gives a vivid idea of the nature and extent of the evils which this city (and others scarcely less) suffers through the extravagant and unprecedented growth of advertising out of doors in many offensive forms, it points out what may be done under existing laws to prohibit the most obnoxious of these nuisances, it recommends measures for regulating what is not prohibited, and it does not hesitate to urge the adoption of a Constitutional amendment giving the public authorities powers of control in this domain the possession of which, under existing judicial interpretations, is either non-existent or doubtful. And in our judgment, neither this proposal, nor the view taken by the Commission of the high public importance of the whole matter, goes a whit beyond what the facts warrant.

It ought to require no circumstantial report to bring home to us the fact that the disfigurement of our cities by enormous advertising signs of all sorts has gone to an intolerable length. The statistical and other data concerning the matter which the Commission gives, we cannot attempt to reproduce; but there is one aspect of this defacement of the city which the present report brings out in a way that is particularly impressive. We refer to the injury done to those places in whose beauty—not to say in whose decent appearance—the people of the city have a peculiar interest. The recommendation placed first in the list of seventeen made by the Commission is as follows:

> We recommend the prohibition of all outdoor advertising structures (but not shop signs, advertisements in vehicles, and the like) on or in the immediate neighborhood of parks, squares, public buildings, boulevards and streets of exceptional character, and in other places of special beauty or sentiment, as wholly incongruous with and detrimental to the locality. This is to include the case where an advertising structure obstructs a fine view.
> As a means to that end, we recommend a constitutional amendment, covering broadly the whole question of æsthetics as a legitimate basis for regulation by statute or ordinance. Meanwhile every billboard on any city park should instantly be removed by the Park Commissioner having jurisdiction.

By photographic illustrations, as well as by the printed word, the hideous defacement of the borders of New York's beautiful parks at scores of conspicuous points is brought home. The picture showing Riverside Drive and One Hundred and Nineteenth Street, with Grant's Tomb in the near distance, is particularly striking and particularly shocking. Another presents the rear of an enormous advertising sign on Riverside Drive, with the litter and rubbish accumulated behind it. The way in which the borders of Central Park and of Prospect Park are disfigured is likewise exhibited. And one picture shows how into the superb view of the Hudson along the big viaduct there is thrust a gigantic advertising structure which the eye cannot escape and which goes far to nullify the benefit of that great and expensive structure as an element in the city's beauty.

But this is only one aspect of the matter. The business of out-of-doors advertising has, as the Commission says, "grown with startling rapidity to enormous proportions; and, aided by electrical and mechanical discoveries and inventions, has assumed not only an astonishing variety of form, but has also become independent of sunlight, so that the wayfarer or citizen cannot escape their importuning by day or by night." Wherever these devices may be actually placed, their use is in essence a use of the public streets. They are addressed to the wayfaring public, and the community cannot protect itself against any discomfort or injury which they may cause, whether to individual persons directly or to the public as a body through its interest in the attractiveness or agreeablenes of the public streets, except by means of legal regulation of the privilege. A privilege it is, in its inherent nature; it is not a private use of private property, but a private use of a public opportunity. Only the comparative novelty of the matter as a thing of great public importance accounts for regarding the assailing of the public eye with glaring signs to promote your private interest as a right, when the assailing of the public ear with loud noises for the same purpose is universally classed as a nuisance.

Many of the recommendations made by the Commission are specific in their nature, and such as require no change either of the Constitution or of the laws of the State. Among these are "the prohibition of large or flashing electric signs in or near residential districts as interruptions to rest or repose," this to be accomplished by the Board of Health through an amendment to the Sanitary Code; "the prohibition of roof-signs in residential districts, and their prohibition elsewhere except on fireproof buildings," by amendment of the Building Code; a limitation of size, applying to all advertisements and advertising structures out of doors; and, last but not least, the imposition of a graded excise tax on such advertisements. In these and other matters the Commission, in addition to a careful discussion of the subject, presents exact forms for the proposed measures. Let us hope that this report will mark the beginning of a radical advance in our dealings with an evil that is at once very serious and distinctly remediable.

THE HOOSIER POET.

James Whitcomb Riley is not in the case of the traditional prophet. The Hoosier is emphatically a man honored in his own country. Twenty-five hundred Indianapolis school-children paid him the tribute of a parade on the occasion of his birthday last week. His publishers have announced a complete edition of his poems. The report that he has "made a million dollars" out of his verse was denied, a year or two ago, but there can be no doubt that he is one of the very few men now alive who have made a good living out of poetry. Indiana lets no opportunity pass of celebrating this citizen, and the entire Middle West is familiar with his poems, a compliment paid to no one else since Eugene Field. At many a hearthstone, the approach of Christmas is welcomed more heartily because the holidays will bring with them new rhymes, and new editions of old rhymes, by Riley. No Indiana school-exhibition day is complete without the recitation of one or more of his poems, and certain of his lines and phrases are part of the Hoosier vernacular.

Now, we are accustomed to learning of some obscure novelist whose works, unknown to the public library and even to the popular lecturer on current tendencies in fiction, sell by the million. We know, too, of versifiers with a national reputation for doing a certain kind of thing gracefully or effectively. Frank L. Stanton's lyrics may not be great poetry, yet they are widely read by intelligent persons. But publishers do not busy themselves getting out complete editions of the works of such novelists or poets. They do not issue the same novels or collections of verse over and over in various editions, so that you can buy a light volume to carry in your hand or a whole set to put upon your shelves. And it surely will not be contended that Riley's verses are of the texture of those of a Eugene Field, for example, not to say a William Vaughn Moody. Then what are the chords they strike that they should be cherished in a multitude of households? One answer is to be found in their tremendous popularity in their native place. Your Hoosier, when he is waxed fat, when his bank account and limousine give assurance of a comfort and a luxury to which his boyhood was a stranger, does not forget those old, but happy, far-off days.

> Pap's got his patent-right, and rich as all creation;
> But where's the peace and comfort that we all had before?
> Le's go a-visitin' back to Griggsby's Station—
> Back where we ust to be so happy and so pore!

Not, be it understood, that he would go back there if he could. But Riley sings of that longing for the simple life which we all deceive ourselves occasionally into thinking that we feel.

In producing this effect, his employment of dialect is an important factor. It may weary the cultivated ear, but it is music to those who would have scorned anything better when they were alternating going to school with "playing hookey."

Up and down old Brandywine,
In the days 'at's past and gone—
With a dad-burn hook-and-line
And a saplin'-pole—I swawn!
I've had more fun, to the square Inch, than ever *any*where!
Heaven to come can't discount mine
Up and down old Brandywine!

He does not hesitate to put the old times above the present:

I' b'en a-kindo "musin'" as the feller says, and I'm 'Bout o' the conclusion that they hain't no better time,
When you come to cipher on it, than the times we ust to know
When we swore our first "dog-gone-it" sorto' solum-like and low.

In addition, he touches the gentler vices with a kind of glory:

Tell you what I like the best—
'Long about knee-deep in June,
'Bout the time strawberries melts
On the vine—some afternoon
Like to jes' git out and rest
And not work at nothin' else!
. . . . . .
March ain't never nothin' new!—
Aprile's altogether too
Brash fer me! and May—I jes'
'Bominate its promises,— Little hints of sunshine and Green around the timber-land—
A few blossoms, and a few
Chip-birds, and a sprout er two—Drap asleep, and it turns in
'Fore daylight and snows ag'in!
But when June comes—Clear my th'oat
With wild honey!—Rench my hair
In the dew! and hold my coat!
Whoop out loud and th'o my hat!—
June wants me, and I'm to spare!
Spread them shadders anywhere,
I'll git down and waller there,
And obleeged to you at that!

An important part of Riley's popularity is due to his verse for children, thousands of whom have had delicious shudders at some elder's repetition of the uncanny tale that ends with the warning: "An' the gobble-uns 'll git you, if you don't watch out!" Ephemeral as most of this is, verse for which children care is so infrequent that any new examples are sure of a welcome. Riley's limitations are too evident to need stating. There is, it must be confessed, not much depth of earth beneath his poetic flowers. Yet for a large number of people in various sections of this country, the coming of autumn suggests nothing so much as the time

When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock.

ALL COTTON MATHER'S FAULT.

In a great many affairs that go wrong to-day the social-minded detectives do not say, Cherchez la femme; they say, Look for the Puritan ancestor. That dour figure in sugar-loaf hat and buff jerkin and breeches, striding on his way to meeting-house with his flintlock and his Bible, is responsible for an extraordinary number of things that now afflict us. He stands in the way of a minimum wage, of Sunday baseball, of the uplifting of the stage, of the speedy solution of the white-slave problem, the divorce problem, the saloon problem, the eugenics problem, the 1 A. M.-lobster-palace problem, and a good many other problems which the theatrical managers on Broadway and elsewhere are aching to solve, but are not allowed to solve.

The Cavaliers despised the Puritan ancestor because he spoke through his nose. But that was a minor fault. The real sin is that he refused to speak at all. He is the original patentee of the conspiracy of silence to which all our ills are due, as contrasted with the happy nations of the Continent where there is no conspiracy of silence on all these fascinating topics, and consequently these problems do not exist. The Puritan exalted salvation at the expense of conversation, thus failing to perceive that the latter is the indispeusable condition for the former. If he had not been so afraid of calling a spade a spade, we should now have a flourishing literature and drama and art, and we should have done away with the social evil, even as conversational peoples like the French and the Germans have done away with it.

Considering that the truth alone can be the basis of true progress and civilization, it is astonishing how many things that whining, hypocritical Puritan ancestor accomplished in his day. In his original home in England he had not been going many years before he cut off the head of a king, sent another king packing about his business, and in other ways pursued a policy of "direct action" that should appeal enormously to W. D. Haywood. Crossing the Atlantic, he helped to lay the foundations of au empire. For a man who hated to call a spade a spade, it is remarkable how well he could use that familiar agricultural implement. He used it to dig up the ungrateful soil of a rock-bound, frost-bitten commonwealth. Later he shouldered his spade, and, still speaking through his nose but for the most part faithful to his conspiracy of silence, he dug up the more grateful soil of the Mississippi Valley and the Western prairies and the Pacific river valleys, with occasional deviations to the pick-axe when he struck the ore-bearing lands of Colorado and the Sierras. He did not lose the early habit of carrying his flintlock into the field. He used it in Kansas, and five years later he was carrying it over a thousand miles of battlefield. In his own hypocritical way, he called it a fight for free institutions against slavery. When the war was over, he went back to farming and railway-building, persistent in his church-going habits and the traditional conspiracy of silence.

We are forced to the conclusion that the Puritan ancestor fared better than he deserved and builded better than he knew. Else how can we explain the surprising fact that, in spite of his aversion to discussing sex-phenomena and sex-rights, he created a form of society in which woman attained a prestige, a freedom of action, and a scope of opportunity such as she had not known in previous ages? Let others explain how the Puritan ancestor, laboring under the handicap of atrophied conversational powers, ignorant of the works of Ellen Key and Olive Schreiner, succeeded in working out a theory that it is man's function to labor and provide, and woman's function to expand and enjoy. The task is too difficult for the present writer. Nor can he explain this other startling fact, that without any knowledge that this is the century of the Child, without explicit recognition of the sacred duty he owed to the future of the race as embodied in the Child, the Puritan ancestor, wherever he went, built his schoolhouse and his meeting house simultaneously; and after the schoolhouse he erected high schools, and after the high schools he created universities, and stinted himself in order that his children might go to these universities and might have more money to spend than was good for them.

From his English home the Puritan ancestor brought over the love of out-of-doors life. It is true that for many years he was inclined to look upon play as the proper occupation of Cavaliers and the invention of the devil. But the passion was bred in the Anglo-Saxon bone, and would out. After a while his young began to play as they used to do in Merrie England before the Reformation; and they have continued to play ever since—football, baseball, and what not, on earth, in the water, and latterly in the air. This again has been detrimental to the development of an art of conversation. Somehow it has remained the habit for the Puritan ancestor's adolescent son to go out on a muddy field and tackle hard the son of another Puritan ancestor, rather than give his mind to the politics of the salon and the boudoir. Probably this is hypocrisy. We have it on the very best modern authority that the sole preoccupation of young manhood and young womanhood should be sex. Only, even if it be hypocrisy, one might argue that a hypocritical mask that has been worn for several hundred years tends to take on something of reality. However, here we are with a tongue-tied, hoydenish young generation that yields but slowly to the missionary efforts of the sex-obsessed. We are still enmeshed in a conspiracy of silence.

It must be that the Puritan ancestor is responsible for all this. For see how William Lloyd Garrison clung to the conspiracy of silence; and recall how Wendell Phillips used to speak through his nose.

SAINT VENUS AND THE CANTERBURY PILGRIMS.

Many a reader of "The Canterbury Tales" has doubtless paused midway in that lively sketch of the Wife of Bath in the general Prologue (A 455-476) and asked: "Why does Chaucer make of the 'worthy woman' a pilgrim to many shrines and a far wanderer?" And the questioner has naturally found his answer in the Wife's words in her own Prologue (D 551-558), composed probably at the same time as the "character":

I hadde the bettre leyser for to pleye,
And for to see, and eek for to be seye
Of lusty folk; what wiste I wher my grace
Was shapen for to be or in what place?
Therefore I made my visitaciouns,
To vigilies and to processiouns,
To preaching eek and to thise pilgrimages,
To pleyes of miracles and mariages.

Now, entire satisfaction with this obvious explanation exists only because a certain mediæval superstition once widely prevalent seems to have faded utterly from view.

To any man of the Middle Ages with the least knowledge of astrology—and who lacked it then?—Venus was the reigning star of pilgrimages. "Sub ipso," writes of that planet Bartholomew the Englishman in his thirteenth-century encyclopædia, "De Proprietatibus Rerum" (VIII, 26), "continetur via et amor et amicitia et peregrinus." And the famous Elizabethan translation of this notable work, "Batman upon Bartholome" (1582), thus renders the complete passage, from which the Latin phrase is quoted:

In man's body he [the planet, Venus] disposeth to faireness, volupt and lyking, in touch and feeling, in smell and taast and in song; and therefore he maketh singers, lovers of musicke and makers of confections, of spicerie and spicers, goldsmithes and taylours to shape women's cloathing; as Misael sayth. And Ptolomeus sayeth that under Venus be these signes, Libra and Taurus and be his houses and hee reigneth in Piscibus, and in Virgine his kingdome faileth and passeth. Under him is contained love, friendship and pilgrimages; and he betokeneth winning, joye and blisse.

Roger Bacon, in his commentary on the "Secretum Secretorum," cited by Bridges in his edition of the "Opus Majus" (I, 403), notes that Venus, in conjunction with the Moon, is favorable to pilgrimages. More picturesque evidence is offered by the wonderful Florentine drawings of Baccio Baldini (or are they Botticelli's own?) illustrating the influences of the planets. Here Venus, accompanied by the blind archer, Cupid, sits in her dove-drawn car and dominates richly clothed lovers, daneers, players, feasters, and, in the middle distanee, mounted travellers. Even as late as the time of Elizabeth, Christopher Heydon, worthy astrologer, notes that Venus, as significator of journeys, promises pleasure, profit, and safety.

Chaucer, who so many times in his poems ("The Compleynt of Mars," 173f.; "The Knight's Tale," A 1904f.; "The Wife of Bath's Prologue," D 697f.; "The Squire's Tale," F 272f.) displays a close acquaintance with the "influences" of Venus, was surely well aware of her domination of pilgrimages. Indeed, indirect evidence of his knowledge of this is at hand. In the very passage of his favorite work, "The Romance of the Rose" (13725f.), which inspired through Eustace Deschamps's "Miroir de Mariage" (so largely used by Chaucer, as Professor Lowes has shown) the lines quoted from the Wife's Prologue, we are explicitly told that "at visitations, marriages, processions, plays, and feasts the god of Love and the goddess keep school and sing mass to their disciples." Hence, because the Wife of Bath "hadde the prente of Seynt Venus seel" and is "al Venerien," it is inevitable from the point of view of mediæval author and reader that she should be a pilgrim. No wonder that Chaucer quotes with approval the old saw that deemed worthy of hanging the man who "suffreth his wyf to go seken halwes" (D 657)! Moreover, the "via," to which Bartholomew gives first place among the influences of the planet, sheds full light upon the line:

She coude muche of wandring by the weye.

This domination of pilgrimages by Venus has, however, a far wider significance for the student of "The Canterbury Tales" than the interpretation of a single trait of the Wife of Bath; for it immediately prompts the query whether the goddess is not sovereign over our English travellers throughout their four days' journey from the Tabard Inn to the cathedral city. This suggestion opens up many far-reaching vistas, which I shall follow later à perte de vue, footing more slowly than is now possible. But the main road lies clear before us. Is not Chaucer as truly "the disciple" and poet of Venus in "The Canterbury Tales" as in "The Legend of Good Women" and in "The House of Fame"? Are not these pilgrim stories as genuinely tales of love as the anecdotes of Gower under Venus's sway in the "Confessio Amantis"? Are not these many-hued productions welded together even more closely by a single motif of passionately human interest than by mere hints of time and place? Absorbed in the careful contemplation of single stories, students have hitherto failed to see Chaucer's wood for the trees. If it can be shown that one unfailing purpose runs throughout the collection, then it is clear that we must cease to regard these delightful narratives as isolated units, like the novelle of this or that Italian, but as integral parts of a splendid whole. The recent classification of a few of the later tales as a "marriage group" recognizes one element, but only one element, in Chaucer's generous scheme. In "The Legend of Good Women," by commission from Venus, the poet confines his treatment of love to the single theme of its martyrdom. In "The Canterbury Tales," still under the auspices of Venus (for is she not the planet of pilgrims?), he so enlarges his plan as to portray from many points of view this ruling passion—chivalric love, tho love of churls, married love in its many phases, religious love with its mastery of the flesh. (By the way, it has been suggested that even "The House of Fame" was designed as the prologue of a series of love stories.)

Not only is Venus the patroness of all pilgrims, but she dominates the mid-April days of the Canterbury pilgrimage. At the time of the gathering at the Tabard the Sun had just passed through the Venus face (the last ten degrees) of the Ram and was now running in the Bull, the mansion of Venus herself—a season, "dedicated by reverent antiquity to the worship of the goddess," as Boccaccio tells us in his "Ameto," to which Chaucer was probably indebted. Boccaccio explicitly devoted these days of Venus to stories of love. Chaucer recognized no less fully all the erotic suggestiveness of the time, but the connection, so obvious to all mediæval readers, between the amorous season and the Love motif of the Tales must be conveyed implicitly for fear of subordinating too far the religious purpose of the pilgrims' journey.

Shall we deem it chance or deep design that in the first and longest of all the Canterbury stories, "The Knight's Tale," Venus is the dea ex machina? She is revealed to the lover in the radiant presence of Emily; on her "gerful" day, Friday, Palemon and Arcite meet in fight; her oratory and her attributes receive large space; in her high service the throng joust and dance; and through her intercession with Saturn, her knight is triumphant. In the strongest contrast to chivalric devotion—for, like our modern poet of "points of view," Browning, Chaucer delights in the clash of opposites—is the light-of-love spirit of such churls as the Miller and the Reeve. In their ribald stories, they reck little of chastity and marriage vows. But their indifference to the rights of husbands must be recorded by the poet, else he will "falsen" some of his matter by so large an omission. It is noteworthy that Chaucer declares his intent to present without gloss the churlish point of view immediately after the Miller introduces in his Prologue (A 3140-3165) the subject of wives. Incidentally, let us remark the external resemblance of the miller's wife in the "Reeve's Tale" to the Wife of Bath, whom Chaucer seems ever to have regarded as the keystone of his narrative arch. The fragmentary tale of the Cook was evidently intended to move on the lowest levels of illicit love. "It is a bawdy planet that will strike where 'tis predominant."

In the "Man of Law's Prologue," which ushers in the Tales of the Second Day, the recognition of our leitmotif fully vindicates the relevancy of the long enumeration of Chaucer's stories of lovers, which has hitherto seemed to the reader so unnecessary and intrusive. The poet intimates that sketches of love's martyrs are essential to the roundness of his plan, but as these have already been adequately portrayed in his "Legend of Good Women," which he calls, in due accord with his conception of Saint Venus, "The Seintes Legende of Cupyde," he may well omit them now. Nor will he include in his scheme examples of incestuous passion, though such "unkinde abhominaciouns" naturally occur to any one developing all phases of love—as indeed to Gower in his "Confessio Amantis." The Man of Law's story is of no martyr, but of a stately wife and mother, who rises superior to suffering and temptation and achieves in the end the high reward of her strength and loyalty by a happy reunion with her kingly husband. The antitype of Constance appears in the unfaithful wife of the "Shipman's Tale," who succumbs readily to the wiles of the monk and is cheated by sordid circumstances into a compact with her cuckold. The juxtaposition of two such stories hardly seems fortuitous; and yet, as I shall show in another article, the tale of Constance, like its little Poverty Prologue, was primarily designed to illustrate Envy, and was inserted here, apparently, as an afterthought.

Despite the social training of the Prioress, and her brooch's amorous device traditionally associated with Venus as in Baldini's drawing and with earthly love as in Deschamps's ballad (yet possessing in Gower's frequent use a wider connotation), the religious lady's story of "the little clergeon" murdered by the Jews falls within the scope of Chaucer's general design only by its insistence upon the power of virginity—a dominant theme in the tales of the Physician and the Second Nun, and in the Wife's Prologue. Chaucer's "Tale of Sir Thopas" parodies the stock motives of conventional romance, the quest of elf-queens and lady's "love-drury," but his "Tale of Melibœus" makes amends for this flippancy by its grave exaltation of wifely counsels. It is significant that the discretion of Dame Prudence and her husband's full accord to her will which anticipates the chief motif of the Wife of Bath are immediately offset by the shrewishness of the Host's Wife (B 3081f.) and directly rebutted by the treachery of Sampson's "lemman Dalida" in the Monk's Tale (B 3181f.):

Beth war by this ensample old and playn
That no men tell hir conseil til hir wyves.

So in the "Nun's Priest's Tale" the counsels of women are derided by the Cock (B 4445f.), who, to his sorrow, takes his wife's advice. And yet the whole tenor of this merry debate has been ignored by commentators—here as elsewhere blind to Chaucer's larger purpose. How thoroughly the stuff he works in is subdued to the dyer's hand is seen in the subordination by the Nun's Priest of the fable of "Cock and Fox" to the mock-romantic theme of the uxoriousness of Chaunticleer, the servant of Venus, "goddesse of plesaunce," who is introduced here (B 4531f.) in lines on her day that recall the Knight's Tale (A 1534). Monk and Nun's Priest are brought into close accord with the prevailing scheme by the Host's description of them as men well fitted by nature to make Venus payments. But the Monk's somnolent "tragedies," devoid of love interest, receive, of course, unsparing condemnation for their heaviness; though the two exempla of Sampson and Hercules which illustrate the treachery of women are revived, under Deschamps's influence, in the Wife of Bath's Prologue.

The interpolation by the Chaucer Society of the Tales of the Physician and the Pardoner between the stories of the Nun's Priest and the Wife of Bath is opposed not only by the evidence of the manuscripts, but by the valuable though neglected testimony of our motif. As "Group C" these two narratives interrupt the progress of the spirited discussion of women's counsels and the wifely relation begun in the "Melibœus" and continued, as we have seen, through the Tales of the Monk and the Nun's Priest to the triumphant conclusions of the Wife. (Chaunticleer, with his many wives, is the proper precursor of that much-married lady.) But if the Physician's Tale is placed after the Franklin's (according to the Ellesmere or A-type tradition, favored here by Tyrwhitt and Skeat), we may then regard the Doctor's story of oppressed virginity courting death rather than disgrace, as directly inspired by the country gentleman's many illustrations of this pathetic theme (F 1364f.). Moreover, the "Pardoner's Tale" is closely bound to the Second Nun's by their common use of the motif of the Deadly Sins (he attacking Avarice and Gluttony and she Sloth), which pervades the later Tales of the collection and culminates in the Parson's sermon.

The "Physician's Tale" (Gower's story of Lechery) is of the foul wrong meditated against Virginia, the gem of chastity, by Appius Claudius, and of its tragic consequences. As Bartholomew the Englishman says, "In Virgine the kingdom of Venus faileth and passeth." The Pardoner's grim story is not of "the way of a man with a maid"; but the rascal, during his denunciation of Avarice and Gluttony, accepts the opportunity to utter his views of unlawful love. A hypocrite always, he decries loudly Lechery, the sin of which he himself is confessedly so often guilty; emphasizing, as the Physician has done just before him, and as the Wife of Bath and the Parson (whose Tale he freely plunders) do also, the close alliance between wine and Venus. Thus the poet advances from tale to tale, the main motif always in view.

It is a very significant circumstance—even though, like many other important elements in Chaucer's plan, it has hitherto escaped attention—that, after the proper disposition of the Physician's and the Pardoner's Tales, the Tale of the Wife of Bath falls in the exact centre of the collection, being the twelfth tale of twenty-four. The Wife of Bath is, indeed, the very keystone of the arch of "The Canterbury Tales." Not merely because she incarnates in her "Venerien" nature the ruling "influence" upon pilgrimages; nor because she bears an obvious likeness to the wives of the Miller's, Reeve's, and Shipman's Tales, in the last of which we seem to hear her voice, and sometimes vies in shrewishness with the Hostess of the Tabard; but because her Prologue and Tale epitomize all the opinions of her fellows upon the woman question. The idea of virginity, reverently presented by the Prioress and later illustrated by the Physician and the Second Nun, is here considered and disclaimed; the jealousy of husbands, a significant feature of the tales of Miller and Reeve, is now more vigorously exemplified; chivalric days and ways, so dear to the Knight and the Squire, form our background here; and the thesis of woman's sovereignty, suggested in the "Melibœus" (B 2900, 3060), and decried in the stories of Monk and Nun's Priest (which should immediately precede her own) is generously expanded and defended both in the Wife's Prologue (D 812f.) and everywhere in her Tale. Despite prevalent opinion, the Wife of Bath has, therefore, a very real connection with the tales that come before. The term "Marriage Group" has been of signal service in indicating the close relation in theme, treatment, manner of comment, and borrowings between the Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale and the stories of the Clerk, Merchant, and Franklin. This connection our best American scholarship has recently put so far beyond question that it demands no discussion now. Yet the limitation of "Marriage Group" to four tales has been most misleading, since such a denotation ignores utterly not only the large use of preceding motives by the Wife, the Merchant's indebtedness to the "Tale of Melibœus," the protracted debate on wifely counsels in Group B, but also the continuation of the marriage theme into the tales of the Second Nun, the Manciple, and the Parson. That the "Wife of Bath's Tale" illustrates Pride and is actually the first of a series of Deadly Sins stories will be demonstrated elsewhere.

Though the tales of the Friar and the Summoner are not stories of love, Chaucer indicates often, both directly and indirectly, their wantonness to women; and in the course of the "Summoner's Tale" (D 1992-2093) he skilfully combines a brief discussion of the woman question with the motif of Wrath. The "Squire's Tale" is a chivalric romance, with Venus reigning. Indeed, the episodical Canon's Yeoman is the only one among all the story-telling pilgrims whose point of view on the problem of the sexes is unrevealed. Yet even here, as is suggested to me by Professor Lowes, whose scholarly support has been my mainstay in the preparation of this article, the Yeoman can find no higher parallel to the priest's glad absorption in the "sorry craft" of alchemy than a knight's chivalric service for his lady (G 1341f.); and the good fellow's hint of the priest's relation to the wife (G 1012f.) shows that he, too, could tell "another story."

The Second Nun follows the prompting of her lady, the Prioress (indeed, almost word for word in one Dante-derived stanza), and the ample suggestion of the Franklin and the Physician in her apotheosis of virginity. Her glorification of Cecilia, the married celibate, is designedly antipodal to the Wife of Bath's hearty championship of octogamy. Here truly are the saints' lives, at which that worldly lady scoffed! It is the "pured wheat-seed" against barley bread—the ascetic ideal against delights of the flesh. The seemingly irrelevant stanzas on Idleness (Second Nun's Prologue) are explained by the deference to the theme of the Deadly Sins, which in these later Tales, as in Gower's "Confessio," mingles with the love theme.

The "Manciple's Tale," an exemplum of Wrath, is a return to the cuckold motif of the earlier stories, but the woman's sin is now a theme for censure rather than for ribald mirth, and the relation of man and wife is gravely discussed. The increasing severity of tone, further apparent in the Manciple's long tirade against Wrath (H 278f.), reaches its culmination in the Parson's lofty arraignment of the Seven Deadly Sins, with the chief stress upon Lechery, in the last of the Tales. "Avoutric of wedded folk," injury to maidenhood, falseness to vows of celibacy—these and yet other phases of the deadly sin of "Luxury," so common in our Tales, are first castigated and then remedied. We are, therefore, quite prepared for Chaucer's full retractation of those of "The Canterbury Tales" that "sounen into sinne."

In following such an outline as this, it must always be remembered that "The Canterbury Tales" is only a fragment, comprising not a fourth of Chaucer's complete design. That the poet's revision and readjustment of his faultily massed and inadequately linked material would have brought the leading motif of love into an even stronger light, we can only conjecture. That the tales of the silent pilgrims would also have dealt with the woman question we have some reason to believe, since the poet's brief description of the five burgesses is not deemed by him complete, until he has devoted several lines to the delight of their wives in the title of "madame" and in precedence at church—a trait shared with the Wife of Bath. If Chaucer nowhere in his Prologue explicitly indicates his controlling idea, the pervading purpose of the poems must have become speedily clear to the mediæval reader trained to the presence of a dominant motif in story-frames by such a famous series of tales as "The Seven Sages," with its ruling themes of the perfidy of women and the unwisdom of counsellors, by the groups of pointed stories in the popular books of exempla, or in mammoth collections like the "Handlynge Synne," by the love "questions" and marriage-tales of Boccaccio's tapestries, the "Filocolo" and the "Ameto" (Tatlock), and finally by Chaucer's own "Legend" (to say nothing of recent claims for "The House of Fame"). Moreover, Chaucer's contemporaries could not have ignored, like us, the curious blending (as in Gower's "Confessio") of the motif of Love with that of the Seven Deadly Sins which I shall discuss in another place. In any case, they must have recognized the traditional domination of pilgrimages by Venus, and her "influence" upon the season of this very journey, and, forgetting Thomas à Becket for the nonce, must have reverently hailed the goddess as the patron saint of the Canterbury road.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

If you asked one of your book-loving friends if he had a complete edition of "Guesses at Truth," he would probably reply by bringing forth with pardonable pride one of the excellent issues of Macmillans. Certainly this has all the appearance of completeness. There is the reproduction of the bust of the two brothers, there is the dedication to Wordsworth, there are the prefaces 1827 and 1838, and there is the memoir signed with the initials of Dean Plumptre, and there is the index compiled by Major Pears. And yet your friend holds within his hand the evidence which shows that he has not the whole of the "Guesses at Truth." If he looks at the advertisement to the 1848 edition, which forms the preface to what is styled the second series, he will read Julius Hare's account of his revision of the book. In the first place he will learn that more than three-fourths of the work is new. The revision was delayed about ten years, and the "second series only goes down to the end of the original first volume."

Julius Hare had been prevented by many seemingly more pressing duties from completing his task, but he says, "As soon as I can get my hands free, I hope God willing to publish a second edition of the original second volume." This he was never able to do. From this it appears that no one has the complete collection of "Guesses at Truth" unless he possess, in addition to any modern copy, the first edition dated 1827.

The revision was carried out in a drastic fashion, some articles were suppressed and others modified very extensively. The greater part of the first volume was the work of Augustus Hare, and the articles were not marked by any initial. Those of Julius were marked "U," a few by Francis are marked "R," and those of Marcus by "A." Those marked by "a" are from the pen of Maria Hare.

As the "Guesses" vary in length from seven or eight pages to an epigram of a single line, it is not easy to make really characteristic quotations, but a few of the shorter articles, omitted in all later issues, may be interesting:

Men who feed on nothing but meat, contract a gross habit of body. Men who think of nothing but money, contract a gross habit of mind; or usurers have been scandalously belied.

There is only one thing which people cannot endure to hear.

Falsehood?—O no, there is not much harm in that.

Flattery?—The sweetest thing in the world; only pray don't oversugar it.

Nonsense?—How could one get through one's time without it?

Reason?—I have nothing to say for it.

Life is the hyphen between matter and spirit.

None ever appropriated like the Romans. They incorporated into their empire not only provinces, but gods.

Who is fit to govern others?
He who governs himself.
You might as well have said: nobody.

Poor Richard! all his geese are swans.
Doubly poor Robert! all his swans are geese.

Que doit on faire dans ce bas monde?
On doit diner.
Et puis?
Badiner.

The life of the body is a perpetual metamorphosis; the life of the soul is a perpetual metempsychosis.

Writing to Bernard Barton on June 8, 1838, Edward FitzGerald, a shrewd, though too often a whimsical, critic, says:

"Guesses at Truth" I know very well; the two brothers are the Hares; one, Julius, a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; the other author of some sermons which I think you had from me this winter. "The Guesses" are well worth reading, nay buying; very ingenious, with a good deal of pedantry and onesidedness (do you know this German word?), which, I believe, chiefly comes from the Trinity fellow Julius, who was a great pedant.

"Pedant" was not a happy description, though it may be confessed that the overflowing erudition of Julius was sometimes inconvenient both to author and to reader.

The "Guesses at Truth" have held their own and will long have a place reserved for them on the shelves of the real book-lover. It is curious to find Augustus in 1826 sketching out a plan of village peusions for agricultural laborers, and it argued some courage for him to ask, "Is there any country in which polygamy is more frequent than in England?" at a time when his sacred Majesty George IV was still adorning the throne of England.

Why should we not have a complete edition of the "Guesses"? The first place should be occupied by a full appreciation of the brothers Hare, of whom Julius was the most notable. In addition to Plumptre's "Memoir" and Stanley's article in the Quarterly, there are now a good many domestic details supplied by the "Memorials of a Quiet Life" of Augustus Julius Charles Hare, who thus sketches a vignette of his uncle:

> Every Sunday morning also my uncle never failed to come to Lime, that he might drive my mother to church, discussing his sermon or the many parish interests, as they slowly ascended the hill on which the church stands, seeing the familiar figures of the well-known country people, the men in their smock-frocks, climbing the steep path above the road, and receiving their affectionate greetings. In the hilltop position of his church, my uncle never ceased to rejoice.

Julius, as the translator of Schleiermacher, was equally remote from the Romanizing tendencies of his friend Manning as he was from the aridity and bigotry of the conventional evangelicals. He strove to breathe a new life into the Church of England. His articles in the British Magazine, including the vindication of Coleridge, were scholarly and timely. His ample power of exposition was remarkably displayed in a note to the "Mission of the Comforter," which grew and grew until it filled 200 pages, and was afterwards printed as a vindication of Luther. "AN ELASTIC CURRENCY."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What has happened to the many sound-money men who in 1896 helped to consign Bryanism to the scrap-heap and are now calling loudly for "an elastic currency"? Have they seen a great light, or have they forgotten that currency is money (or, what is the same thing here, a substitute for money); that money is the standard of value, and that an elastic standard is a contradiction in terms—a vicious absurdity? Do they not know that the first essential of a standard of value is stability of value, and that stability and elasticity are mutually contradictory and can never co-exist in the same subject—that precisely to the extent that a currency is elastic it is unstable, and precisely to the extent that it is stable it is non-elastic? If they reply that what they desire is elasticity, not of value, but of volume, then do they not know that volume and value can never be dissociated; that the value of the constituent units of any commodity varies inversely with the volume, or supply, of that commodity; that, therefore, an elastic volume of currency means an elastic currency-dollar, which is the same thing in principle as an elastic yard-stick or an elastic bushel, for the use of which men are sent to jail?

Can they not see that in trying to procure a currency that will be at once elastic and stable they are seeking a manifest impossibility; that they might as well seek for a perpetual motion, a hot cold, or a wet dry? HERBERT L. BAKER.

[Money is a medium of exchange as well as a standard of value, and it is the first-named function exclusively which banknote issues are designed to perform. When such notes are made redeemable on demand in gold, and when their redemption, after the special requirements of exchange have been met, is insured by the provisions of their issue, gold is the standard of value as clearly as if there were no banknote circulation.—ED. A CONCORDANCE TO HORACE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you allow me through your columns to draw the attention of students of Latin to the following matter?

During the early summer, with the assistance of several friends and students, I made a complete concordance to Horace, in which the quotations accompanying the words consist of the printed metrical lines, cut out of Vollmer's text, and pasted on slips, the method employed being much the same as the one I used in making my Concordance to Wordsworth. There has been virtually no transcription, and the work as it stands is necessarily very accurate.

The question arises, Would these quotations serve the purpose, or would Latin scholars prefer some other form of reference? I should be glad to receive suggestions by letter on a point which, as a student of English, I am not for the moment prepared to decide; in fact, any counsel regarding the work would be welcome, for I am eager to produce a better record of the language of Horace than such as are already in existence—the one, for example, in Zangmeister's edition of Bentley's Horace, where the typographical arrangement is very bad. If the metrical line makes a satisfactory quotation, my slips need only to be thrown into alphabetical order, and the concordance will be ready for the printer. LANE COOPER.

TEACHERS OF ENGLISH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Amid the tempest of discussion concerning the teaching of composition in our universities, one salient fact seems to have been overlooked. I refer to the increasing relegation of classes in freshman composition, particularly in State universities, to the brains of A.B.s and A.M.s, fresh from academic lands and uninitiated tourists on the continent of teaching. Results are scarcely commendable. Without any experience, selected solely because of facility in composition or more often because of ability in literature classes, donated with positions that State universities may have more graduate students, these young men, with rare exceptions, stumble through a year of such teaching as would never be endured in a good secondary school. They know the theory neither of composition nor of helpful criticism. Inevitably, of course, these novices win experience; in their second year they may do fair work. Nevertheless, before even such gainful outcome ensues, hundreds of freshmen are sacrificed to standards of grading too low or (occasionally) too high; the lash of irony and sarcasm, borrowed by the tyros from the armories of their admired (and more tactful) professors at Harvard, Columbia, or Cornell, embitters scores of students against the entire department of rhetoric; and, finally, the task of the hapless sophomore instructor is doubled and deepened, when the droves of victims reach him.

Were there no remedy at hand, these evils might be tolerated. Fortunately, successful experienced teachers could be culled from even the wastes of our wretched secondary schools; and many of these teachers, whom I have personally interviewed, would be glad to be culled—be it at financial sacrifice. The barriers, then? They are two: the belief of the A.B. cum laude that he would be "wasting his ability" by gaining experience in a secondary school; and the octopus-like grasp upon our State university departments of English and rhetoric by "bureaus of recommendation" in certain institutions of prestige. SOCIALISM AND LABOR.

Professor Simkhovitch has no difficulty in establishing his thesis of the bankruptcy of Marx's theory of "scientific" Socialism. Those who have kept in touch with the Socialistic literature of the past ten or fifteen years are familiar with the extent of the destruction wrought in the Marxian structure by the irresistible logic of hostile facts, and in "Marxism versus Socialism" these facts are marshalled in clear compact array so that he who runs may read. It is not in any spirit of belittlement of Professor Simkhovitch's services that the reviewer suggests that his book almost gives one the impression of slaying the dead; fairer, perhaps, would it be to say that it, decently and in order, interes the corpse. The work, in any case, has been well done, and in a way was worth the doing, for while Marxian Socialism may be dead as a scientific theory, a great many worthy people are still unaware of that fact —including, possibly, a large proportion of the "Intercollegiate" Socialist membership, to whom "Marxism versus Socialism" may be recommended.

"Every tendency," says Professor Simkhoviteh (and he handily proves what he says) "that Marx and Engels confided in has been checked, retarded, deflected, or reversed. Industry has not concentrated to any such extent as the fathers of scientific Socialism expected. Agriculture shows tendencies towards decentralization. The concentration of wealth and proletarization of the middle class has proved a fable: the moderate incomes are steadily increasing in number. The idea of the growing misery of the proletariat is abandoned in view of facts that prove the opposite; the class struggle, instead of increasing, is as a whole diminishing. Commercial crises that were to increase till they destroyed, like an earthquake, our whole industrial organization, are admittedly abating their fury."

Of course, this does not mean that Socialism or the Coöperative Commonwealth is impossible. But it does mean that Socialism is just as "Utopian" today as it was before Marx wrote and rescued it from that estate which seemed so low in his eyes and in the eyes of the generation which followed him. And, as Professor Simkhovitch says in his Introduction, "to-day the social movement throughout the world is in one sense but a quest for a new possible meaning of the word Socialism."

Pat to the reviewer's hand comes a shining proof of the truth of that statement in the shape of a new book by William English Walling—"The Larger Aspects of Socialism." The author has earned the right to a front-rank place among the American Socialist "intellectuals" and his "Socialism As It Is" of two years ago was an interesting objective study of the Socialist movement the world over. A clear-sighted observer, and a reporter honest with himself and the public, he there furnished abundant evidence of the great recent change in character of the Socialist movement from that which marked it in the days of Marx. Within its covers was contained most of the evidence that one could desire to prove the death of the Marxian hypothesis—as indeed the reviewer then pointed out. Now he comes to exhibit to us the soul of the new Socialism, which he calls "a new civilization that is gradually being embodied in a new social movement." In the "Larger Aspects of Socialism," which is, as he himself says, complementary to "Socialism As It Is," he presents to us this soul, and he finds it not in any materialistic Hegelianism, not in any mechanistic system of evolution, but in what he calls the "philosophy of modern science," and this proves to be Pragmatism!

Mr. Walling's definitions of Socialism as he now understands the word are more eloquent than pages of explanation, and we must let him state his own case in his own way:

> It is customary for Socialist writers, in spite of these admitted facts, to define the Socialist movement as being mainly a class-struggle of working people against capitalists, and then proceed to qualify this definition. This procedure is not in accord with the present methods of science which demand instead of a rigid definition with an unlimited number of qualifications a definition broad enough and loose enough so that it does not need to be qualified. From this standpoint perhaps the nearest we can come to a definition is to say that Socialism is a movement of the non-privileged to overthrow the privileged in industry and government. . . . In other words, Socialism is a struggle of those who have less against those who have more than equal opportunity would afford (p. 11).

> The conflict of Socialism with present society is not in reality a class struggle. It is not a struggle between two social classes or even two groups of social classes. It is a class struggle only on one side. The ruling class or ruling classes are more or less unified; Socialism represents the opposition of all the rest of the population but not of a class. . . . There is only one class, the class that rules humanity and must be conquered by humanity. . . . Both the phrases "class-struggle" and "class-consciousness" may legitimately be used to mean exactly the opposite of what the majority of socialists intend them to mean (p. xiii).

All that remains wholly unobjectionable of the older Socialistic formulations is the "economic interpretation," and that, too, must be construed in a new way. Because latter-day Pragmatism—and particularly the system of Professor Dewey—gives it a new meaning, Mr. Walling adopts this philosophic system as being virtually Socialism itself. "Social truth is born in social struggles. . . . This truth and this alone is the essence of all Socialism, from Marx to modern Pragmatism." Consequently, in place of the absolutely inevitable process of inexorable law which issues in the Coöperative Commonwealth as its necessary culmination —the "scientific" Marxian view—Mr. Walling adopts the principle enunciated by John A. Hobson, that "so far as the selection, valuation, and utilization of realities go Man is the Maker of the Universe." This he regards as "the principle which underlies both modern science and philosophy and the modern social movement, that is, Socialism." And Socialism "armed with the new philosophy will revolutionize all civilization and culture—as soon, that is, as economic and social conditions permit the masses to realize and to utilize the new science and the new philosophy."

Doubtless, Mr. Walling would vigorously deny the charge that he was no better than a "Utopian" Socialist; and, on the ground that there is in his philosophy no fixed principle of justice—or of anything else beyond the fixed principle that philosophy itself evolves—and in his ethics no "ought," he might possibly obtain a technical acquittal. But when he says that Socialism "is evolving in the fullest sense of the word; that is, like every living thing it is taking on characters that could not have been predicted even by omniscience (sic), to say nothing of the merely human powers of foresight of its early formulators," he clearly pitches his tent very far away from the old Socialist encampment, and it is only by straining the word "science" that he cannot connect it with his position.

It is as an example of the tendency noted by Professor Simkhovitch that Mr. Walling's latest book is mainly important. His naïve discovery of Pragmatism ("a new name for old ways of thinking," as James called it!), and his enthusiastic acclamation of the "new science" and the "new philosophy," are accomplished with a gloriously dogmatic repudiation of all dogma, whether of science, art, or religion, and an authoritative rejection of all authority, which give his work a pleasant flavor of youth and freshness. One may, however, wonder whether in his identification of Pragmatism with Socialism Mr. Walling represents a real advance-guard of Socialistic thought, or merely a small band of foragers poking around in the brush. To our thinking it is as a clear-sighted observer and honest chronicler of what he has seen rather than as a philosopher that Mr. Walling best serves the community, and one "Socialism As It Is" is worth a dozen of its immediate successor.

Despite his somewhat rhetorical tone, Mr. John Graham Brooks gives us in "American Syndicalism—The I. W. W." a readable, timely, and valuable account of that movement towards "industrial unionism" in the United States which has of late loomed so large in labor matters. Vast and varied as are the current misconceptions of the Socialist movement in general, they are hardly greater than are the perplexities aroused in the lay mind by this latest disturber. "Like the sound of a bell in the night, the 'Industrial Workers of the World' strike an alarm note that seems as new and strange to us as if some unknown enemy were at the gate. Both the purpose and the weapons used are alien and uncanny to our thought."

The most direct way to an understanding of syndicalism, whether at home or abroad, is to understand its lineage. Mr. Brooks points out that its chief forerunners were Owens's Grand Lodge, the International, and the American Knights of Labor, but its true parentage is through Marxian Socialism, of which it is to-day the ultimate orthodox expression. Sorel was justified in his boast that he was a truer prophet of the Marxian faith than were the German Socialists, and, as Mr. Brooks points out, the personnel of the syndicalist ranks, the rank and file of the I. W. W., more clearly represent the Marxian proletariat than does any other aggregation of humanity to-day. "The I. W. W. taps labor strata not only lower than those of the trade union, but still lower than those from which Socialism generally gets recruits." The fine distinctions and new constructions of the newer Socialism have neither meaning nor importance for these, and it is not surprising that the syndicalist movement finds itself at odds almost as much with modern Socialism as with the existing system Standing squarely on the platform that labor—and this means manual labor—produces all wealth, and that wealth belongs to its producer the syndicalist proposes by "direct action"—which excludes all "evolutionary" or political methods—to drive out the capitalist and take possession of all industries in the name of the worker. What is to come after that operation has been performed has not been made very clear by the syndicalist spokesmen, but it is reasonably clear that their point of view approximates more closely to that of the philosophic anarchist than that of the Socialist. Society will ultimately consist mainly of industrial groups which shall be autonomous in the fullest sense of that word. It is important to note that from the notion of "direct action" the syndicalist excludes nothing in the way of force or violence which may be effective towards the desired end, and he is usually frank enough to admit this.

But it is equally important to view the movement with sympathy sufficient to produce understanding of its springs of strength. Mr. Brooks's chapter on Some Duties of Our Own deserves careful reading, especially by those who are disposed to dismiss the whole business as the product of "agitation," "demagogy," and so on. It is not wholly rhetoric which speaks of the "crusade" spirit in the "I. W. W.," and it does not require much insight to see that, crude, wrongheaded, brutal as it may be in its methods and its professed aims, the movement expresses a real and an enduring aspiration on the part of a class now becoming for the first time conscious and articulate. Violent repression is not the only way in which to meet it—least of all repression which is lawless in its methods.

Messrs. Watney and Little have written an interesting book, despite the fact that the "Industrial Warfare" of which they treat is confined to Great Britain. Notwithstanding its condensation, the information contained in its pages is arranged in readable fashion and is given in a pleasantly detached objective style, free, so far as one can see, from personal prejudice and parti pris. The accounts of the organizations governing the principal industries are peculiarly interesting, as are the descriptions of the recent great trade disputes.

Apart from this the book is of interest as showing the great departure that has been made in England from the traditional policy of laissez-faire as a result of the coal-mining, railway, and transport strikes of the past few years, which culminated in the direct intervention of Government. On this point the authors say:

> The Government has always abstained from any direct intervention on the grounds both of policy and custom; of policy because it has always held that statutory enactments are a bar to the free development of trade and a certain means of hampering the progressive development of the position of the individual worker; of custom because it has always been considered that the commerce of this country, having been built up on an individualistic basis, should in fairness be judged on its extremely successful results. It has probably also been greatly influenced in its attitude of abstention by the hostility of all the interests concerned. The employers certainly have never asked for legislation; the workmen may have asked for it, but they have often turned and rent the donor of the boon. . . . Probably these warnings would have deterred the Government from doing anything but for the fact that organized Labor was very badly beaten in the transport strike of 1912, and for the additional circumstance that the community was getting restless at finding itself the invariable cock-shy of these organized groups of contestants for their own particular interests. It has been said that no Government in this country ever moved except under the stress of public opinion, and it certainly was the case with the ministry of 1912 (pp. 235-6).

The lines on which Government will probably proceed are based on the fact that both Labor and Capital are highly organized, and that the proper course to pursue is that of perfecting these organizations, and driving them into practical trade agreements enforceable on either side. The craft-union is still dominant in Britain as compared with all other forms or theories of labor organization, and neither syndicalism nor theoretical Socialism has left much mark on the labor situation as yet. Syndicalism, however, has been more successful than have older forms of Socialism, especially in the case of the lower strata of labor. One reason for this is well expressed by Messrs. Watney and Little in the following:

> The great defect of the artisan temperament of the present day is its reluctance or rather its positive aversion to accept responsibility or even to run risks. This is an outcome of character, the result of hereditary training, and hence it may be that in time the worker will come to emulate the middle class in its speculative tendencies and in its willingness to accept the shadow of the present for the substance of the future. No scheme, copartnership bonus or any other, is really welcome to the ordinary worker if it entails future risk or present sacrifice (pp. 250-1).

This is true of the "British workman" more than of any other workman. But it is true also of the more "skilled" classes of workmen in every country as compared with the "unskilled" classes, and it may be seen in the United States to some extent. It is where there is little to lose that the ideal of syndicalism finds most fruitful soil.

CURRENT FICTION.

Bendish: A Study in Prodigality. By Maurice Hewlett. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

In its inconclusive way a sequel to "Mrs. Lancelot," this narrative seems to promise yet another. Lord Bendish, the titular hero of the story, is the one person with whom we may be content to have finished. He bears somewhat the same relation to Byron as Gervase Poore in the story bears to Shelley, but is a good deal nearer caricature. The Byronic pose, the Byronic failings, are so enhanced as to make Bendish merely contemptible and ridiculous, and Byron never was that. However, it may be that before we have done with him we shall see a Bendish ennobled by a final scene of the Missolonghi order. Poore is certainly worthy of further acquaintance. He is still the single-minded enthusiast of "Mrs. Lancelot," but he has steadied and ripened, is more credible and more admirable. By defect of his virtues, he is capable of becoming, to a certain point, the tool and the dupe of Bendish: wakened and roused, he is a strong man pitted against a spoiled child.

The opening chapter feints at a new heroine, but Rose Pierson, of Golder's Green, is merely the ingenue. In the Myrtle Cottage of her aunt, Bendish has found sanctuary from London husbands and duns. Rose becomes a plaything, but is not destined to be numbered among his victims. Neither is Georgiana Poore (late Lancelot), though he takes more pains with her. Georgiana and her Gervase have remained in Italy, after coming to their odd understanding with her husband and her Duke of Devizes. Lancelot has duly divorced her, and thereafter, dying disconsolate, has left her his money. With Roger Heniker, solicitor, sent by the old Duke to urge her acceptance of the bequest and her return to England and himself, goes Lord Bendish seeking fresh adventure. The lady will not have the money, but acknowledges the Duke's claim upon her friendship and her presence. Poore, a little at a loss, but magnanimous, consents to return to England. Thereupon Bendish incites Poore to the poem of Revolt, and while he is at it makes up to Georgiana. Contemptuously dismissed by her, he goes on his way, and revenges himself by pillorying her in "The Wanderer" ("Childe Harold," of course) as the ruthless cause of his sorrows. This, rather than his later treachery with regard to Poore's "Vision of Revolt," leads to a duel between the poets, in which Poore is wounded and Georgiana finally compelled to leave Italy for her husband's side —and the Duke's. Of Bendish, we say, there seems nothing more worth learning than these pages convey. Of the oddly linked three, Georgiana, Gervase, and the Duke, there may be much.

The Destroyer: A Tale of International Intrigue. By Burton E. Stevenson. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

To those foreign peoples that have been suspecting their neighbors of intriguing to obtain supremacy in one form or other, Mr. Stevenson's tale will doubtless bring the terror he designed for it. The American reader, not being so hysterical in such matters, will find it difficult to credit some of the infernal acts here recounted. Yet in seizing upon the blowing-up of La Liberté in Toulon harbor, which came at the time of Germany's activity in Morocco and followed close on the heels of the destruction of the Jena, he has taken an incident well suited to a mystery story. Unfortunately, the mystery is not long hidden. It soon becomes certain, at least to M. Delcassé, M. Lépine, and another Frenchman, that La Liberté has been sunk by an agent of Germany, the inventor of a sort of wireless fatal to all powder magazines. That he is caught, the invention converted to the use of France, and the forts of Strassburg only spared because the operator, the sole possessor of his secret, dies just at the crucial moment, may be disclosed to the reader without telling him too much. For the main interest of the story revolves about the pursuit of the criminal. In this the author has made happy use of the services of M. Crochard, famous for his operations in "The Boule Cabinet" mystery. When it is purely a question of patriotism, France may rely, it seems, even on her underworld.

Gracechurch. By John Ayscough. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

Gracechurch is identified, geographically and historically, as a small town near the Welsh border. Our author's recollections date from the 'sixties, and his avowed intention is to embalm in a bookful of affectionate reminiscence the scenes and people of his boyhood home. An apt apologist, he warns us prefatorially that "the string on which these Gracechurch papers are strung together is stronger than any of consecutive narrative working towards the climax of a plot, for it is the simple and indestructible one of love for the dear old place and the dear, kind people who lived there." As might be expected, the attempt to cement incoherence with sentiment is not a notable success. What we find is no more than an aggregation of genre bits, in the handling of which much ingratiating pleasantry and plenty of humor of the most unexceptionably gentle sort has been employed.

Although realizing at the outset that he must expect a strong literary likeness between Gracechurch and the Cranford of classic fame, the reader will still find something uncanny in the antiquarian cast from which this author's imaginative vision suffers. In his eye every spinster is a mausoleum of romance—fortunately time fails him for unlocking them all—and the cases he cites of female insanity brought on by amatory crises are alarmingly frequent even for the dark Victorian era. Another disadvantage under which this chronicler of bygone quaintness labors is a memory clouded by a very present preoccupation with religious distinctions. Some years after the recorded days of Gracechurch life, the author entered the Roman Catholic Church, and this coming event casts its shadow over all the incidents of the book, curiously coloring past impressions, and still more curiously distorting the outlines of certain minor episodes.

Merrilie Dawes. By Frank H. Spearman. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

So subdued to the business medium it works in is Mr. Spearman's hand that his heroes make love in the very vein in which they drive through a commercial project, and his heroines respond as if answering a broker's call. There is more than a trace of woodenness in the John Adrane of this book, the Annie Whitney to whom he is engaged at its opening, and the Merrilie Dawes whom he marries after the various vicissitudes of commerce and love which it narrates. Those who are interested in the novel of business life which Mr. Spearman affects, however, will find here a specimen typical in its merits as well as its defects. Certainly there is no flagging of interest in its central pages, where we see a great panic lift and shake John, the builder of railways, and Merrilie, an orphaned heiress, together with all the other capitalists and executives of Gotham and the East. It is this time of trial for men's souls that reveals to John, Annie, and Merrilie at once that a reshuffling of the matrimonial cards is urgent; and the reader, who has always occupied an Olympian position in this regard, is not surprised at the friendliness of the final arrangement. The financial action that interlocks with the love-story is plausibly and, in the crucial scenes, admirably done.

MAKING THE CONSTITUTION.

The Framing of the Constitution of the United States. By Max Farrand, Professor of History in Yale University. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2 net.

There is only one fact concerning the Constitution over which there is no controversy: all agree that certain delegates from all the States but Rhode Island met in Philadelphia in the summer of 1787 and framed it, and beyond that all is dispute. Whence its various provisions came, what they mean, who should be called its father, or fathers, are questions about which a thousand briefs have been written and to which nothing that is fresh can now be added. Happily, Mr. Farrand has avoided these stale questions, and gives us the one thing that was really desired—a simple, straightforward narrative of the proceedings of the Convention which made the Constitution. It is the first to appear since the discoveries in recent years of new or fugitive material for the history of the framing—of the notes of Paterson, McHenry, King, Wilson, and others, nearly all of which Mr. Farrand himself gathered into permanent form in his monumental work, "The Records of the Federal Convention," published in 1911. Mr. Farrand's attitude towards his subject is temperate and impartial—we had almost said cool and unenthusiastic—but he warms towards Washington occasionally and towards Madison and Wilson at the end. His style is clear, but we think it is at times too light for the weighty subject he is treating. The Convention was a great event in the history of the world. It was an assemblage of whales, who should not be described in language more applicable to little fishes.

For example: Mr. Farrand says of Edmund Randolph that "as a figurehead he was splendid," of Robert Morris that he was "large, florid, and pleasantly impressive," of Alexander Hamilton that "he was too conceited and overbearing to be popular," and of Madison's report: "he took his work so seriously that it seemed to have stifled any sense of humor he is said to have possessed and deprived his notes of any enlivening qualities." As a matter of fact, Randolph was never a splendid figurehead, and when the Convention met was one of the most influential men of Virginia; Robert Morris was much more than "pleasantly impressive," and the masterfulness and self appreciation of Hamilton were quite different from "conceit." As for Madison's "notes," we cannot imagine why any one should look for merriment in them and complain because he failed to find any jokes. Criticism like this, however, is largely a matter of temperament and taste and need not detract from the verdict that Mr. Farrand's work is admirable both in plan and execution.

The deficiencies of the Article of Confederation were discussed in the Continental Congress and were understood by intelligent Americans generally. Therefore, when the delegates, many of whom had been in the Congress, met, though several of them had made a careful study of governments ancient and modern, as Mr. Farrand says, "when it came to the concrete problem before them they seldom, if ever, went outside of their own experience and observation."

The Virginia plan was the basis of these proceedings, and it included a remedy for virtually every deficiency in the Articles of Confederation that had become palpable. The Pinckney plan received no attention from the Convention, and was only used by the Committee of Detail in arranging its report. The Jersey plan was the expression of the conservative element of the Convention, which wanted the principles of the Articles of Confederation preserved. Hamilton's plan, unfolded in his elaborate speech, excited curiosity but had no followers. The great contest arose between the Virginia proposal of a national republic and the Jersey plan of a federation of States, whence the compromise which recognized one principle in the House of Representatives and the other in the Senate. Mr. Farrand's treatment of slavery in the Constitution is good. He says that the proceedings of the Convention were not published until slavery had become the dominant political issue in America, and, in consequence, the commentators over-emphasized the discussion of the subject in the Convention, and the error has continued; but, in truth, slavery was by no means the dominant issue in 1787, and it was generally believed that the Southern States would eventually effect emancipation as the Northern States had done. These facts justify Mr. Farrand in treating the bargain between the far Southern States and the East by which navigation laws were traded for recognition of the slave trade and slave property as of secondary importance. The account of the proceedings of the Committee of Detail is derived from sources recently discovered, chiefly the papers of James Wilson in the Pennsylvania Historical Society. They reveal some of the proceedings of the Committee and enable a specialist to conjecture others. Here the declarations which the Convention had adopted in a crude form were moulded into definite shape and here many important subordinate provisions were added. The paragraphed report which the Committee offered was the second great step towards the completed Constitution. In preparing it the Committee used for convenience a copy of the Articles of Confederation, of the Jersey plan, and of the Pinckney plan, and also drew largely upon the State Constitutions, especially the Constitution of New York, which Pinckney also had used in preparing his plan.

Again, new material is employed in the chapter on the election of the President. It tends to show that some of the delegates may have believed that other delegates were in favor of a monarchy. The suspicion rests chiefly upon a memorandum by James McHenry of a remark by his colleague from Maryland, John Francis Mercer. Mercer, however, was a man of uncertain opinions, unsound judgment, complaining and jealous disposition. He left the Convention in disgust when he saw it headed towards a national government. Afterwards he said that McHenry had mistaken his meaning. In fact, the suspicion is built upon a foundation so flimsy that it does not deserve to be taken seriously.

In the closing chapter Mr. Farrand gives an estimate of the influence of the members in shaping the Constitution. The master-builder, he says, was Madison; Hamilton was not in touch with the situation; the second man in the Convention was James Wilson, and Madison's strongest supporter next to him was Washington. He also estimates the completed Constitution. There was virtually nothing new or unfamiliar in it. "Every provision," he says, "can be accounted for in American experience between 1776 and 1789." It was a practical piece of work, but not logical, else the leaders would have provided for such contingencies as afterwards arose in the Embargo of 1807, the tariff of 1816, Nullification and Secession. One reason why it was accepted so readily after it had been adopted was that trade revived at that time. "It was floated on a wave of commercial prosperity," says Mr. Farrand. We do not accept this estimate. A practical piece of work the Constitution unquestionably was; but it came to be accepted only as it came to prove itself. The feeling that it had saved for the country what the Revolution had won increased as the years passed, and as a broad Continental patriotism grew under the union which it had created, the sentiment of attachment towards it grew. Mr. Farrand speaks disparagingly of "the worship of the Constitution" which appeared; but the expression is inaccurate, and savors more of modern politics than of historical judgment, for the Constitution has inspired veneration in the people, not worship.

William Morris: A Study in Personality. By Arthur Compton-Rickett. With an Introduction by R. B. Cunninghame-Graham. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50 net.

This successful study of a man well worth any biographer's mettle falls into two parts, of varying degrees of merit. In the first, a sketch of the manner of man William Morris was, a sturdy directness of method is exactly suited to his dynamic, tempestuous, out-of-doors personality. The author has been at pains to draw from every possible acquaintance of the poet a wealth of new personalia. All Morris's traits—his furious activity, on the highroad or in the studio; his tumbling carelessness of manner; his frequent outbursts of temper; his obstinate dogmatizings; his generosity; his hatred of the subjective, the unpractical, and the narrow, are illustrated by a variety of anecdotes and sayings: "I always thank God," Morris once exclaimed in a typical speech, "for making anything so strong as an onion!" For all his attainments, the man had little of subtlety or complexity to analyze, and Mr. Rickett's firm strokes leave us feeling that we know him to his "sturdy, primal core."

In the later chapters—on The Poet, The Craftsman, The Prose Romancer, and The Social Reformer—this direct, unanalytical force does not serve Mr. Rickett so well. He has no eye for critical nuances, and he does not treat with grace of touch, or appraise with discrimination, Morris's finest artistic and literary product. In the pages dealing with Morris as artist, or as Socialist, for example, we have a full picture of a rich career, but we look in vain for an estimate of his real achievement in either field. The chapter on Morris as poet, again, does full justice to Morris's lucidity, virility, and the rich predominance of the perceptive over the reflective in his writings. But his single eye to the spacious beauty of Morris's narratives leaves him far more uncritical of his overfluency and lowness of flight than if he had viewed him comparatively, among his Victorian compeers. To Mr. Rickett, Morris's poetry, his craftsmanship, and his reforms are so significant as exponents of his superabundant manhood that the background of the period sometimes falls out of perspective.

But the personality of Morris inheres in every page of the book. We see him as a painter, so angry at a chance interruption as to kick a panel out of the door; as a dyer, his beard streaked with color, on his hands and knees in ecstatic contemplation of a rug; as a decorator, gloriously indicating the exit of his atelier to an American who found his colors too vivid, with the roar, "If you want dirt, you can seek that in the streets!" To his remark upon his Oxford verses, that "if this is poetry, it is very easy," Mr. Rickett instances two parallels. Some one had spoken of designing as the most exciting of occupations. "I don't see it at all," said Morris; "if you can do it, you can, and if you can't, you can't. Again, "Any one can be a public speaker," he once declared to a friend, "if he only peg away sufficiently at it." We see him, too, as a reformer, the kindest master of workingmen in England. A bungler once averted a discharge by feigning to discover a trout in a neighboring stream. "Quick, man, get your line," cried Morris; "don't go and lose the damned thing!" and the grievance was forgotten. His energy irradiates the whole book. Just before the period of his novels, Sir William Richmond found him disconsolate. "What's the matter, Top?" he inquired. "O, hang it all," said Morris, "I shall have to find out another toy." As Mr. Rickett observes, what to another man would have been the pursuit of a lifetime was but a single phase of his career.

Vāsavadattā: A Sanskrit Romance by Subandhu. Translated with an Introduction and Notes by Louis H. Gray, Ph.D. New York: Columbia University Press. (Lemcke & Buechner.)

While the greater part of Sanskrit literature is religious, ethical, or philosophical, the later writers of the renascence turned gayly to lighter themes, and developed in various forms a literature which was primarily artistic. Even the epic compositions of later date show a conscious striving after style; poetic conceits became popular; form became more important than subject-matter. By the sixth century of our era, to which epoch is to be assigned the "Vāsavadattā," this new tendency reached such a pass that style may be said to be everything. Thus Subandhu, the author of the famous romance here presented in English dress, prides himself more upon his ability to make puns than upon any other excellence. And in truth the work he composed is so filled with single, double, and even triple puns that no translation can give the effect of the original. The best that any translater could do has been done by Dr. Gray, who has by a system of brackets indicated how many puns are found in each clause. The romance itself is overweighted with description, and Dr. Gray, in his scholarly introduction, has drawn an ingenious parallel between the affectations of the Sanskrit author and the style and spirit of Lyly's "Euphues."

So rare is the romance in Sanskrit literature that an outline of the plot of this tale may be welcomed by students of comparative literature. A young prince sees in a dream a vision of a lovely maiden and sets out to find her. Wandering in the mountains, he hears a bird who tells his mate of Vāsavadattā, a king's daughter of surpassing beauty, who had seen in a dream a matchless youth and fallen in love with the vision. With the help of this revelation, and eventually assisted by her maid, the prince discovers the princess, who is, of course, the girl he had seen in the dream; but parental interference postpones their marriage and the damsel is spirited away. At last, after a weary search, the prince discovers her; but she has been changed into stone owing to the curse of a hermit, who, like the irascible saint of the "Rāmāyana," petrified the intruder upon his privacy; and Vāsavadattā, like the heavenly Rambhā, was existent and yet unrecognizable. Fortunately, her shape was preserved, and the prince, thinking idly that the form of the stone was like that of Vāsavadattā, put his hand upon the rock, and it became the maiden. "Then the prince went to his own city with her and lived some time, enjoying such pleasure as even the gods find difficult to obtain." The sudden ending after interminable passages of "too, too gaudy" description strikes the Occidental reader as the best thing in the story.

Dr. Gray has illustrated the incidents of this tale with parallels drawn from a wide range of reading, and has added to the carefully edited text and excellent translation a full bibliography and a list of new words of considerable lexicographical value. The introduction is in the form of a thorough historical critique of the place of the "Vāsavadattā" in Sanskrit literature. Minor slips are hard to discover. On page 80, the husband of Ahalyā should be Gautama, not Brihaspati.

Nelson in England: A Domestic Chronicle. By E. Hallam Moorhouse. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.50 net.

In Lord Nelson's fascinating personality one may discern two quite distinct beings. There is the Man of Destiny on whom Genius laid her awful hand, the hero of the battles of Copenhagen, Aboukir, and Trafalgar, the patriot ready to sacrifice his life for his country; and, on the other hand, there is the frail sensitive son of a good and gentle father, ever fond of quiet English country life either at the Burnham Thorpe Rectory, where he grew up as a boy, or at Merton, where he lived his last blissful days with Lady Hamilton.

It is with the second of these beings —with the domestic side of Nelson's life and character—that Mr. Moorhouse's charming volume deals. He pictures the happy, wholesome atmosphere of the Norfolk village in which Nelson spent his childhood. Anecdotes of hunting birds' eggs and of school show that the slim, delicate youth even in his early years was possessed of an indomitable will and an entire absence of bodily fear. He went to sea at an unusually early age, and in the West Indies in 1787 married Fanny Nisbet, a young widow of eighteen. She was an estimable girl, who might have adorned one of Jane Austen's pages, but, as Mr. Moorhouse rightly observes, this marriage was a misfortune for both Nelson and his wife. Though Nelson loved her and for several years believed himself happy with her, she was lacking in the ardent kind of responsiveness and in the capacity for caressing affection; yet these were the qualities in a beautiful woman, as events turned out, which could stir Nelson's deepest feelings and cause him to stray strangely far from the path of propriety in which he had been trained by his father. In the descriptions of the enthusiastic crowds which always hailed Nelson, and in the account of his magnificent funeral the author makes one realize what an idol Nelson was to the whole of the English nation. He has been very successful in picking out from the mass of Nelson letters those passages which allude to Nelson's old family home, to his unfortunate marriage, to Lady Hamilton, and to all the little objects of joy or sorrow which made up the background of the daily life of the Admiral. He has added to the charm of his descriptions by reproducing several portraits and other illustrations.

Of deep human interest is the story of Nelson's passion for Lady Hamilton, and Mr. Moorhouse has told the story extremely simply and well. Soon after Nelson met Sir William and Lady Hamilton in Sicily, his letters to his own wife in England became infrequent and cold. She naturally became disturbed at this and at the rumors of Nelson's new attachment, and she proposed to come out to Sicily and join him. But he decisively forbade her to do so. When at last, after years of absence, and after winning immortal glory at the Battle of the Nile, he finally set out on his triumphal overland progress homeward, he was accompanied by the Hamiltons, to the scandal of many people who saw them on the Continent. As he landed at Yarmouth in the midst of huzzaing English patriots, Lady Hamilton walked down the little wooden jetty with her hand on his arm. Everywhere she shared in the applause as if she had been his own wife, instead of being old Sir William's. Curiously enough, there were but few in England to criticise his extraordinary conduct; people thought only of their idol's naval victories, not of his moral shortcomings. Shortly afterwards, Nelson separated from his wife, and lived unblushingly with the Hamiltons. Three years later he wrote naïvely in his diary: "Our dear Sir William died at ten minutes past ten this morning in Lady Hamilton's and my arms without a sigh or a struggle." One may sympathize with Lady Nelson in the cruel suffering which she endured from such a husband, and yet Mr. Moorhouse makes one feel glad, in spite of morality, that Nelson's affectionate nature found the satisfaction which his own wife's temperament denied him, in his love for his "divine Emma" and for their daughter, Horatia.

This edition includes 220 poems which have never before appeared in book form, and many of which are here printed for the first time, as well as several heretofore unpublished prose sketches—these in addition to all of the author's works which have previously been published.

New volumes in Macmillan's Fiction Library are F. Marion Crawford's "The Heart of Rome"; Jack London's "Adventure"; Zona Gale's "The Loves of Pelleas and Etarre," and Hamilton Drummond's "The Justice of the King." All of these except Zona Gale's volume are full-length novels. Hers is made up of the delicately sentimental stories of the aged Pelleas and his aged wife which appeared originally in various magazines. Read rapidly one after another, these tales may pall a little upon their too greedy peruser individually, most persons will find them rarely entertaining. On Mr. Crawford's and Mr. London's stories, comment is unnecessary. Those who have not read "The Justice of the King" have a complicated plot awaiting their attention: it is woven of the political animosities of the time of Louis XI, and has to do especially with the relations of that monarch and the youthful Dauphin. Four new volumes have just been published in Macmillan's Juvenile Library also. One of these, E. V. Lucas's "The Slowcoach," relates the adventures of a party of English children in going about a portion of England in a "caravan," or what our own boys and girls would call a gypsy wagon. The other stories are American. They are Joseph A. Altscheler's "The Horsemen of the Plains," which is sufficiently described by its subtitle, "A Story of the Great Cheyenne War"; Mabel Osgood Wright's Yankee tale, "Aunt Jimmy's Will," and Charles Major's "Uncle Tom Andy Bill," a narrative, as he confesses, of those fascinating topics, bears and Indian treasure. New additions to the Macmillan Standard Library are Edward T. Devine's authoritative book on "Misery and Its Causes"; Franklin Pierce's "The Tariff and the Trusts," and the collection of chapters on various phases of religion, to which George Hodges gives the general title of "Everyman's Religion." The volumes in all of these series are sold at fifty cents each.

Madame d'Aulnoy's fairy tales and picturesque memoirs of the court of Spain are famous, but her "Memoirs of the Court of England, 1675," have been far less read—and deservedly, for their interest is rather tenuous. Nevertheless, we can welcome a sprightly modern translation made by Mrs. W. H. Arthur and now published, with illustrations, by John Lane. Of direct historical value these "Memoirs" are almost destitute, except in so far as they reproduce the general tone and manners of Whitehall under the second Charles. For that reason, though we may applaud the diligence of Mr. G. D. Gilbert in running down the identity of the four anonymous ladies who figure in the story, we cannot feel that the knowledge gained is of any particular importance. If read as an historical romance the book is fairly entertaining, though it lacks the sel that gives flavor to Grammont's kindred (and somewhat later) chronicle of scandals. Madame d'Aulnoy had a glimpse of the actual court of England and was clever enough to understand what was going on. There may even be a basis in fact for some of the intrigues she narrates, but it is perfectly plain that the tangles of adventures in which she ensnares her dukes and duchesses and ladies in waiting is chiefly of her own contriving. As for the conversations behind closed doors, she might excuse herself for inventing these by the example of classic historians, but more probably she was not pretending to be more than a writer of romance. As an appendix Mr. Gilbert has added the story of Lucy Walter, mother of the Duke of Monmouth, in which he brings together in good order all the available information in regard to that shadowy and debatable character.

Theodore Roosevelt's "History as Literature, and Other Essays" (Scribner) brings together his address as president of the American Historical Association in 1912, the title essay; his Oxford address on "Biological Analogies in History"; his addresses at the University of Berlin and the Sorbonne on "The World Movement" and "Citizenship in a Republic," together with a number of essays originally written for the Outlook and the Century. The Oxford, Berlin, and Paris addresses have already been published in a volume entitled "African and European Addresses," and the object of reproducing them here is not apparent. As the longer papers have already been commented upon from time to time in these columns, they need no further evaluation now. The volume as a whole is another illustration of the range and versatility of Mr. Roosevelt's intellectual interests, and the several addresses and papers compare favorably with the non-political writings of most of our public men. That the knowledge which they exhibit is wide rather than deep, the expressions of opinion suggestive rather than convincing, and the criticism of accepted standards often airy and superficial, is, of course, entirely characteristic.

An unusually harsh note in regard to England is struck by F. Garcia Calderon in the opening chapter of his "Latin America" (Scribner). For him Spain is represented by Ariel, while Caliban, "half man, half devil, with his elemental knowledge of nature and his dual cunning and his stunted faculties," has given England a vast empire. Few writers are more ardently Latin in their tendencies. "Wilful and mystical, the Spanish temperament is active, and expresses itself externally in conflict; it manifests itself in comedy and tragedy. . . . The struggle is not only for independence, but for fame, to preserve the integrity of honor in the general eye." There is true analysis here, although distorted by racial pride. In these days when so many Spanish-Americans are more proud of the history of the Aztecs and Incas than of Spain, it is pleasant to find one who acknowledges the important debt his continent owes to the mother-country. But Mr. Calderon is more than a Peruvian diplomat. He is a thoroughly Frenchified Latin-American. By a series of explosive paragraphs he almost succeeds in keeping the reader from discerning the actual state of the racial conflict which he endeavors to describe. A passionate student of political philosophy, disregardful of geography and economics, he fails to realize the full significance of many underlying causes. Take, for example, the well-known expulsion of Jews and Moors from Spain. To our author this is merely an evidence of the Spaniard's adherence to rigid ideals of religious and political intolerance. There is no appreciation of any underlying economic cause. In fact, he would probably deny that there was any. To him the ideal hero is Don Quixote—"incomparable in theoretic and ideal statesmanship," as Lowell said. All these characteristics make his book decidedly interesting as a human document and peculiarly significant as giving a picture of Latin America from the point of view of an intensely loyal Latin. His chapter on the North American Peril ought to be read by every one. It begins: "To save themselves from Yankee imperialism the American democracies would almost accept a German alliance, or the aid of Japanese arms; everywhere the Americans of the North are feared. In the Antilles and in Central America hostility against the Anglo-Saxon invaders assumes the character of a Latin crusade."

Last winter was published anonymously a clever book of letters of travel called "European Years." Now in "More Letters by an Idle Man" (Houghton Mifflin) the veil is lifted, and we learn that the writer is Hermann Jackson Warner. The letters are addressed from Nassau to Tokio with a preponderance of European postmarks. Faithfully and long the author has pursued the quest of reasonable economy combined with superlative climate, developing the while a shrewd and tartly humorous vein of observation. For bad political prophecy he has a sort of genius. The Bulgarian-Servian war suggests an impending Armageddon; Garfield's assassination, the utter hopelessness of attaining a reformed civil service. But the apology is forthcoming, "Dyspeptic folk with a pessimistic turn are always singularly youthful, and generally live to a great age, but the thing that keeps people alive longest, as a rule, is cussedness." It is such whimsical perception of his own foible that may endear the Idle Man to a certain class of readers. Such an outburst as the following is characteristic: "I am told to read 'Marcella,' Mrs. Humphry Ward's last; socialistic and that kind of thing. I should be glad if I never heard again the word socialism. I never knew till lately to what extent I am conservative and fogy, but this riot of new and impossible theories for reorganizing mankind upsets me altogether; I am thrown off my feet; the old world totters and a new world in which I am to earn my daily bread by street sweeping, looms on an horizon red with blood of fogies." Your reviewer has found the crusty flavor of these letters agreeable, and could have got along with a smaller supply.

As a readable analysis, Arthur Ransome's "Oscar Wilde" (Mitchell Kennerley) possesses merit beyond its modest size and price, for the contents are well proportioned between descriptive characterization and criticism of Wilde's work. The biography of Wilde is touched upon only as a chronological background, and in brief interpretation of his doctrine of life as "an artistic creation"—the æsthetic expression, ideally, of an intense personality. The main criticism to which Mr. Ransome exposes himself is that his emphasis is too greatly and too superficially upon style. His chief delight, as of course his easiest task, is expounding the language of the poetry and tales, in the rich tapestries of which he sees the author's real contribution to literature—"a feeling for decorative effect." His catalogues of golden phrases would be quite justifiable, did he not avoid the real problems of Wilde's style in declining any attempt to link his decorative tendencies critically to the theories of "Intentions" and other essays, or historically to impulses gained from the French and the Pre-Raphaelites. There follows also from this emphasis upon expression a failure to give homogeneity to the various departments of Wilde's work—novels, poems, essays, dramas—so unlike in outward color and mood, so like in inner essence. The natural contradictions in the author are emphasized, and an insuperable barrier seems raised between, for example, the rich playfulness of "The Happy Prince" and the amazing intellectual dexterity of the comedies. And when Mr. Ransome comes to the portion of Wilde's work where sense is everything and style nothing—the "De Profundis" and other productions of 1897 to 1901—he fails perceptibly. But in all, Wilde's content and critical thought are by no means wholly neglected; and Mr. Ransome's treatment of his style, as a literary force, is just, and his appraisal of his literary station unexaggerated.

Reminiscence, somewhat disconnected but possessing considerable historical value in its presentation of the development of organized library activities, is offered by Samuel Sweet Green, veteran librarian of Worcester, Mass., in "The Public Library Movement in the United States, 1853-1893," published by the Boston Book Company, as No. 8 of their Useful Reference series. Mr. Green looks back upon a long span of active years, for he became a trustee of the Worcester Public Library in 1867, and its librarian in 1871, retiring as librarian emeritus in 1909, and his life has been closely associated with the American Library Association, the Massachusetts Free Public Library Commission, and other related library activities. His chronicle, of some 300 pages, opens with a brief account of the Librarians' Convention of 1853, in New York, the first effort towards the organization finally effected in 1876. From this later year, when the American Library Association held its initial meeting at the Philadelphia Centennial, he gives a fairly continuous chronological record, to and including the library activities at the Chicago World's Fair in 1893. These seventeen years were the formative period of the American public library, blazing the way for the far-reaching development of the twenty years since, in their formulation of principles and methods and their propaganda for State and local associations of librarians and for specialized library training. Those who know the public library systems of the present day will find here many interesting sidelights upon their progress, such as the first daring experiments in opening library reading rooms on Sunday; the gradual replacement of printed catalogues by the printed catalogue card and the special reference list; the extension of library facilities to children; the admission of readers to the bookshelves, and the steady increase in printed aids and guides in book selection; and the gradual preponderance of women in a field whose workers in the beginning were almost all men. Mr. Green gives many personalia, often trivial, and dwells upon many minor details of the jaunts and sightseeing connected with the annual meetings of the American Library Association. But though his record is informal, lacking in cohesion and in literary expression, it has the engaging qualities of sincere devotion to a calling and of friendly admiration for fellow-workers of every degree.

The "Barrington-Bernard Correspondence," edited by Edward Channing and Archibald Cary Coolidge (Harvard University Press), which makes the seventeenth volume of the Harvard Historical Studies, consists mainly of unofficial letters between Gov. Bernard and Lord Barrington during the period from 1760 to 1770. The letters have been selected from the eight volumes of Bernard Letter-Books which were purchased by Jared Sparks and are now in the library of Harvard University. Besides the letters, the volume contains some documents of an illustrative character, the most important of which is a somewhat detailed account of the conditions in Massachusetts in 1774. From much of the correspondence, one might conclude that few things interested Bernard more than to obtain an easy berth with a good salary. In some of the letters, nevertheless, he gives clear expression to his ideas on the political situation. Like most of the colonial Governors, Bernard deplored the half-hearted methods of the English Government in dealing with the colonial opposition. There is a strong desire, writes Barrington, "that no disputes should arise between Governors and their Assemblies." The gist of the policy of the Government in the eighteenth century is contained in this phrase. Very strict formal instructions were issued to the Governors; but those Governors who tried to carry them out to the letter invariably got into trouble with their Assemblies; and those who got into trouble with their Assemblies were generally recalled. But after 1763 such a policy was no longer possible. It was not a question, as Bernard says, "whether there shall be a stamp act or not, but whether America shall or shall not be subject to Great Britain." "In Britain the American Governments are considered as corporations empowered to make by-laws; in America they claim to be perfect States, not otherwise dependent upon Great Britain than by having the same King." Bernard was one of those who saw that either the colonies must be allowed to go their own way, which would be easy, or that there must be a thoroughgoing change in the form of colonial government, which would be difficult, but, according to Bernard, not impracticable.

The first part of Mr. A. J. B. Wavell's "A Modern Pilgrim in Mecca: and a Siege in Sanaa" (Small, Maynard) deals with the author's experiences and vicissitudes in his trip to Mecca. It is entirely a personal narrative, and interesting as such. He went to Medina by train from Damascus, considerably ahead of pilgrimage time. There he found fighting with the neighboring Arab tribes in progress and the city almost in a state of siege. Consequently, instead of going on by land, he proceeded by sea to Yembu, on the Red Sea, and thence by boat to Jiddah, from which place he went to Mecca in true pilgrim fashion. Indeed, from Damascus onward, he was a part of the pilgrimage, performing all the religious rites and ceremonies. Except that Mr. Wavell was in constant apprehension of discovery, especially through pilgrims from Mombasa, where he had spent some time and become well known, his life was in no regard different from that of an ordinary, well-to-do Moslem pilgrim. He saw the bad and the good about him, and the simple narrative of the ceremonies, with notices of certain individuals with whom he was thrown, constitutes a very vivid and instructive story. The second part of his journey is interesting only because here, too, he went where he was not expected to go and caused much trouble, both to the Turkish authorities and to his own Government. Contriving to elude Turkish vigilance at Hodeidah, the port of the Yemen, he succeeded in reaching Sanaa, the principal town of the interior, which, almost immediately after his arrival, was besieged by the Imam, the subject prince of Yemen, who was then in revolt against the Turkish overlord. He intended to make explorations in that extremely interesting region, which has been very imperfectly explored. In this he failed altogether. While purporting to relate his experiences during the siege, his attempt, after its conclusion, to escape further into the interior for purposes of exploration, his ignominious capture, imprisonment, and return to Hodeidah, this part of the book was too evidently written to satisfy a grudge against the English Government for its failure to take his part, make the Turks let him go where he would, and insist upon redress for his arrest and deportation.

Of Dr. J. G. Frazer's Gifford Lectures on "The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead," the first volume is now published (Macmillan), dealing with "The Belief among the Aborigines of Australia, the Torres Straits Islands, New Guinea, and Melanesia." It displays the wealth of detail and the easy flow of narration with which we are familiar in the author's preceding works. At the outset he carefully defines the limits of his inquiry. He declines to express any opinion for or against a belief in immortality. He will confine himself strictly to reporting the views of the lower tribes, and of these he now takes only those of which he has made particular study. Hereafter, he says, he may extend his investigation to include other communities, uncivilized and civilized. For the present his purpose is to avoid, as far as possible, all comparisons and generalizations—he cannot, however, avoid bringing out the fact that in the regions under consideration religious organization has gone hand in hand with economic and political progress. But in general it is enough for him to show that such and such a tribe had just such and such ideas and ceremonies.

Dr. Frazer's plan leads him to give in minute detail the opinions held in the western Pacific concerning the nature and future of the soul and the nature and activities of ghosts. These last are the principal agents in the religious experience of the Pacific savages. There are also spirits, superhuman beings that have never been connected with human bodies; but ghosts have the principal rôle. As the conduct of life is largely determined in these tribes by the conceptions of souls and ghosts, Frazer's descriptions amount almost to a sketch of the civilization of the area in question. However, alongside of the ghost cult proper there is abundant employment of magic, and sorcerers are powerful. Frazer observes that in persons and things efficient in magical processes there appears, according to the native idea, to be inherent a sort of supernatural force—that which is now commonly called mana. That is, magic is essentially dependence on a supernatural power for the guidance of life. If this be so, it is unnecessary to draw a sharp line of distinction between magic and religion (as Frazer elsewhere does)—rather, the two represent two stages of growth in the resort to the superhuman. True, the mana in magic is controlled by the magician; but there seems to be no radical difference between such control and the procedure of the savage who takes and discards his fetish spirit at will or that of the half-civilized man who binds his god to keep him at home or reviles or beats him if he does not respond favorably to requests. Our knowledge of the genesis of savage gods is far from being complete. Frazer mentions cases in which a ghost, as it seems, grows to be a true god; but great caution must be exercised in the treatment of such cases. This collection of data, based on observations as trustworthy as such observations can ever be, will long continue to furnish material to students of early sociology. The volume suggests various problems. Thus, the psychological unity of the western Pacific region is obvious—what is its origin? Dr. Frazer, in accordance with his plan, ignores such questions; but they will, doubtless, occur to many readers.

Stephen Jenkins, whose death is reported from Lakewood, N. J., at the age of fifty-six, had graduated from the Naval Academy and served in the Spanish-American war. He was the author of "A Princess and Another" and "The Greatest Street in the World."

Charles Francis Richardson, professor emeritus of Anglo-Saxon and English language and literature at Dartmouth College, died last week at Lisbon, N. H., aged sixty-two years. He had been a member of the Dartmouth faculty for thirty-one years. From 1872 to 1878 he was on the staff of the New York Independent. Among his writings are "The Cross" (poems), "The Choice of Books," "American Literature, 1607-1895," in two volumes, "The End of the Beginning" (a romance), "A Study of English Rhyme," and as editor, "Poe's Complete Works."

The Rev. Dr. Jacob Isidor Mombert died last week at his home in Paterson, N. J., in his eighty-fourth year. Dr. Mombert was born in Cassel, Germany, and received his education in German theological institutions. In 1866 the University of Pennsylvania conferred on him the degree of D.D. In 1877 he became rector of Christ Church, Jersey City, but two years later accepted a call to St. John's Church, Passaic, one of the largest Episcopal churches in the East. He remained as its rector until 1882, when he retired. He was one of the contributing editors to the Churchman. Among his works are translations of "Thoriuck's Psalms" and "The Catholic Epistles," besides a "Short History of the Crusades."

Robinson Ellis, corpus professor of Latin literature at Oxford since 1893, is dead in London. He was born at Barming, Kent, in 1834; was educated at Elizabeth College, Guernsey, Rugby, and Balliol College, Oxford, and was fellow of Trinity, Oxford, in 1858. He became professor of Latin, University College, London, in 1870, and was Latin reader at Oxford from 1883 to 1893. He is best known as an authority on Catullus. Besides his edition of that poet's works, his publications include many volumes, articles, and lectures on classical subjects. He was a frequent contributor to the American Journal of Philology.

Cardinal Gregorio Maria Aguirre y Garcia, Primate of Spain, died in Madrid on the 9th inst. He was born in Pola de Gordon, Diocese of Oviedo, in 1835, and was created Cardinal in 1907. He was Archbishop of Toledo and Patriarch of the West Indies. Cardinal Aguirre took an active part in the contest over the bill governing religious organizations in Spain, which he denounced as a violation of the agreement between Spain and the Vatican.

Science

FIRST HALF-CENTURY OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

A History of the First Half-Century of the National Academy of Sciences. Washington, D. C.

The official records of the Academy do not contain an account of the first meeting, held in New York city, April 22, 1863; even the names of the thirty-one or two original members then present have to be taken from a partly incorrect list in a newspaper of the day following. Regarding so important a matter as the selection of the fifty incorporators, there is only a personal letter of Commodore (afterwards Admiral) C. H. Davis, dated February 20, 1863, in which it is stated: "The Academy [that is, the bill for its incorporation] is to be introduced into Congress by Mr. Wilson. The whole plan of it was arranged last night between Mr. Wilson, Agassiz, Bache, and Ben"; namely, by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, Profs. Louis Agassiz and Benjamin Pierce of Harvard, Superintendent Bache of the Coast Survey, and presumably also the letter-writer, Commodore Davis, of the navy. It is therefore to be inferred that the four self-appointed scientists thus informally assembled in Washington took the matter into their own hands and selected forty-six additional names to make up a list of the fifty leading scientific investigators of that time. The list "caused some dissatisfaction when published," but it may be doubted whether any other method would have led to a better selection, or have obtained more general approval.

The Academy was incorporated by act of Congress on March 3, 1863. In celebration of its first half-century of existence it now issues, under the direction of a committee of which Dr. Arnold Hague, recording secretary of the Academy for some years past, was chairman, a handsome volume of 400 pages, prepared by Mr. F. W. True, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, whose careful work shows him to have been well chosen as author and editor. The book contains four chapters: The Founding of the Academy, The Annals of the Academy, Biographical Sketches of the Incorporators, and The Academy as Scientific Adviser to the Government, followed by several statistical appendices and an index. Seven of the twelve plates are portraits of the past presidents, Bache, Henry, Rogers, Marsh, Gibbs, Agassiz, and Remsen.

The object of the Academy, in the minds of some of its most active and influential founders, was to "afford recognition to those men of science who have done original work of real importance," and to "aid the Government in the solution of technical scientific problems having a practical bearing on the conduct of public business"; but the Act of Incorporation mentions, properly enough, only the second object, regarding which more is said below. "Recognition" has happily never reached the self-conscious stage at which members habitually add the initials "M.N.A." to their names, following the "F.R.S." fashion that obtains in Great Britain; still less do they announce their membership on their visiting cards, as is the approved style for Academicians in France; and they are not yet subject to the discomfort of wearing a sort of uniform at official functions, such as is expected of certain Academicians in Germany. It is indeed possible that with us academic membership has not always been taken seriously enough. One of the proposed incorporators refused his opportunity. Regarding another, a personal letter written at the time says: "He is quite mortified at himself, that he can be so tickled with a straw." At a later period a supposedly prevalent opinion about the Academy was tersely phrased in the saying: "It's nothing to belong, but it's hell not to," with the exaggeration characteristic of terse sayings in both clauses. It may, however, be believed that some pleasure is caused by the congratulatory telegrams often sent by old members as announcement of election to new ones. The pleasure is, moreover, usually heightened by association with surprise; for to the credit of American manners be it said that nominations and elections to the Academy are conducted not only with the most careful and jealous scrutiny, but with honest secrecy, and are thus in striking contrast with certain European election methods, where a candidate for academic honors has to nominate himself, makes a round of formal calls on the electors, and personally vaunt his claims. It was lately said of a candidate for election to a famous foreign academy: "After the election he will take a vacation in the country." "Why?" asked an innocent hearer. "Because the work of candidacy is so fatiguing." Self-announced candidacy with us would insure rejection.

The second chapter of the semi-centennial volume narrates the chief events of the peripatetic autumn meetings held in various cities, often in connection with some university, and of the annual meetings held in Washington, and thus gives a good indication of the subjects which have attracted the most attention from the assembled members. The meetings are evidently serious affairs, but they are quiet and inconspicuous, seldom attracting the attention of many non-members, and never reaching an appearance of national importance. Even the Chief Executive of the Government which created the Academy, when called upon at the Washington meeting following his inauguration, has not always seemed to be aware of the opinion that his callers have of themselves. On one such occasion the Academicians were hustled with scant courtesy through the White House corridors between two political delegations of distinctly non-academic complexion, which, as the more dignified members thought, were pressed too closely upon the real meat of this sandwich. On the other hand, there was compensation for such remissness in the hearty attention of another President, who not only allotted the better part of an afternoon to a personal reception of the Academy, but himself presented a number of medals and awards to the recipients selected by the Academy, opening his remarks with cordial assurance of welcome to the company gathered around him, and finally, as if contrasting politics and science, as he handed a valuable award to a noted physicist, closing with the phrase: "I envy you the practice of a profession at once calculable and exact."

One reason for the relatively small importance of the meetings of the Academy is that the great size of the United States is a serious discouragement to attendance on the part of distant members. Another reason is that too many of the most valued and active members are so hard oppressed with home work and so little impressed with the meetings they have attended that they do not include regular attendance among their personal duties. Although the original limitation to fifty members was withdrawn by Congressional amendment in 1870, so that the roll now carries more than one hundred names, the number of members at a meeting is commonly from twenty to forty; and even this moderate representation is fully gathered only in the business sessions and at the festive dinner, especially at the business session for the election of new members.

The publications of the Academy are of so limited a nature as to be a disappointment to many of its members. Brief summaries in the form of annual reports are, to be sure, complete from the beginning. Seven volumes of biographical memoirs constitute a valuable record, but, unhappily, the notices of some members long deceased are still lacking. Three small Annuals appeared in early years (1865-1867), but although the by-law providing for their publication remained in apparent force until thirty years later, no other numbers were printed. One volume of Proceedings, published in three parts (1877, 1886, 1896), has no successors. Eleven volumes of Memoirs have been irregularly issued, periods varying from one to eighteen years elapsing between the successive dates of imprint; but as these volumes contain only sixty-eight of the more than two thousand papers presented at the half-century of meetings, it is evident that the members of the Academy usually prefer some other medium than its own publications in which to print their essays. If it be desired to give the National Academy a greater importance than it has yet reached in the opinion of the scientific public, nothing would contribute more to this end than the publication of at least the greater part of the work of the members in its own proceedings; but to accomplish this there ought to be a salaried secretary, who should give his whole time to the Academy's affairs.

One of the most important offices of the Academy is the administration of bequests and trust funds committed to its care for the furtherance or reward of scientific research. Their total now exceeds $200,000, and the work accomplished by their aid includes many notable scientific contributions by leading investigators. If, as is proposed in the semi-centennial volume, a list of the titles of all communications presented to the Academy should subsequently be published, it would be well to include at the same time a list of the grants from its trust funds and the place of publication of the results thus reached. Although the funds now in hand serve a large purpose, the chief lesson to be drawn from them is the surprising one that the most distinguished body of scientists in the country should have so seldom been selected by generous testators as the trustees for their scientific benefactions in a land as rich as the United States. This must mean that the existence of the Academy is very generally unknown.

The most characteristic feature of the National Academy, wherein it differs farthest from all our other scientific organizations, is its work as scientific adviser to the Government. The longest chapter of the semi-centennial volume is appropriately given to this subject. It there appears that during the past fifty years thirty-two reports have been requested by Congress or by governmental officials, and have been made by specially appointed committees of experts. Many of these reports are of high scientific value, but their number is disappointingly small. When, in knowledge of the enormous increase of the Government's scientific activity during the existence of the Academy, it is noted that the reports made in successive decades number 14, 2, 9, 4, and 3, the showing becomes more disappointing still. Indeed, in view of the treatment by Congress of the last two reports, the showing is decidedly discouraging. A report on scientific explorations of the Philippine Islands, requested by President Roosevelt in 1902, was made in 1903, but did not reach Congress until 1905; it was then referred to a committee and ordered to be printed, "but was not reported back." In 1908 a comprehensive report was asked for by Congress on "the methods and expenses of conducting scientific work under the Government"; the report was carefully prepared by five Academicians of eminent ability and high position, and submitted in 1909; but its recommendations, to put it gently, "have not yet been adopted by Congress."

The reason for the small and decreasing number of scientific problems submitted for academic report is not far to seek. The heads of various important scientific bureaus are not necessarily members of the National Academy; yet to them is given, under the Secretary of their Department, almost autocratic control of their bureau's work, with no obligation whatever to ask the opinion of a certain body of eminent investigators as to what should or should not be done. For example, the recommendations regarding Philippine surveys "appear to have failed to obtain support mainly on account of the opposition of the late Dr. Paul C. Freer, who thought that they would interfere with the scientific work in the Philippines which was under his jurisdiction as head of the Government laboratories in Manila." Whether Dr. Freer was wise in this opinion need not be discussed here; but he was certainly correct in it, for the report of the Academy's committee proposed the transference of directing authority from Manila to Washington, where it should be in the hands of a board of which Freer was not to be a member. In view of human nature in general, to say nothing of bureaucratic human nature in particular, it is as plain as need be that no requests for advice from the National Academy will come from the chiefs of bureaus who are not already members of the Academy, and who therefore cannot be members of the committee to which the requests would be referred. If a bureau chief made such a request, it would be tantamount to admitting that he did not know how to conduct the affairs of the bureau over which he had been placed, and that he had to ask help from persons who had not been selected to direct it. On the other hand, Congress is not likely to ask for reports unless things go wrong, as in the case of the competing geological surveys of various governmental departments in the '70's and '80's, which finally became so scandalous that the advice of the Academy was asked, and in most respects taken (see pp. 268-279).

Whether it is desirable that the influence of the Academy as the scientific adviser to the Government should be increased or not is, like the questions of increasing the publications and the trust funds, open to discussion; but assuming that the question is answered in the affirmative, it might be a wise step to give formal recognition to all the chiefs of the more important scientific bureaus by constituting them "associates" of the Academy, ex-officio. With such a relation established, it is eminently possible that a wise and powerful, and therefore self-respecting, bureau chief would ask for the appointment of a standing committee of the Academy, with which he might confer as occasion should arise in the conduct of his duties. Without some such formal recognition, it is questionable whether further continuation of the duty of reporting by the Academy, with the growing probability of having its reports pigeonholed, is desirable. The Act of Incorporation of the Academy provides that the actual expenses entailed in making reports shall be paid, but that the members of the Academy "shall receive no compensation whatever for any services to the Government of the United States." This provision seems, under existing conditions, likely to become more literally true than might have been expected when it was worded.

Drama

Lady Gregory is publishing, through Putnams, "Our Irish Theatre," which includes the history of Dublin Theatre from its inception.

In his lectures on "Ten More Plays of Shakespeare" (Holt) Stopford Brooke avoids the methods of most students of Elizabethan drama. He is not interested in Shakespeare's relation to his own era; of the great playwright's use of his sources, of the literary fashions of that day, and the theatrical requirements we hear next to nothing. The plays are regarded as masterpieces which can stand the criticism of any age. This is a refreshing attitude and in the main just, yet by strictly adhering to it, the author occasionally finds himself in an awkward position. Thus he is completely balked by the character of Iago and is finally reduced to calling him "a dirty dog." Nothing is said concerning the gentle pastime of refined villany which in the century succeeding Machiavelli played such a large part in literature and which as a convention justified itself or not according to the degree of its subtlety. His discussion of Julius Cæsar would also have been more illuminating if he had at least taken account of the traditional conceptions of the great Emperor which prevailed in Shakespeare's day. Nor is the following passage concerning Prince Hal's change of heart towards Falstaff after becoming King quite satisfactory:

> It seems hard that at his coronation he should publicly abandon Falstaff, and I wish the parting had been otherwise done. But Shakespeare's Henry was never soft-hearted; and it was amazingly insolent of Falstaff to meet the King before all his people at the solemnity of the coronation with "God save thy Grace, King Hal; God save thee, my sweet boy." No King could bear that impertinence.

Here again Mr. Brooke fails to reckon with the transformation of character, which, in the popular mind, was bound to result from the mere process of being anointed King. Absoluto consistency between the prince and the prince become king was not expected. A further serious difficulty results from this method of approach. Mr. Brooke, disregarding the fact that tragedies of blood and revenge were in great demand, reads into Shakespeare's choice of such brutal material as that which went into the making of "Othello" a disbelief in a beneficent Providence.

In the main, the book comprises a series of pleasant, analytical appreciations which the average student may read with profit; at times the language rises to reverential eloquence. An occasional futility and even insularity the reader will be inclined to overlook. It is amusing, for instance, that Mr. Brooke should bother to inquire whether Beatrice and Benedick were "in love before the play opens" and to conclude that "they were only interested in one another"; or that he should be so concerned over Beatrice's outburst against Claudio: "O God, that I were a man! I would eat his heart in the market-place." On which Mr. Brooke remarks, "Of course, she would not have done it. It may be spoken, not accomplished." The following plays are treated: "Much Ado About Nothing," "Twelfth Night," "Julius Cæsar," "Hamlet," "Measure for Measure," "Othello," "King Lear," "King John," both parts of "Henry IV," and "Henry V."

The third impersonation offered by Forbes-Robertson in the course of his present engagement at the Shubert Theatre was Dick Heldar in a revival of George Fleming's adaptation of "The Light That Failed." His impersonation, greatly admired in this city some years ago, has ripened since then, and is now a finished bit of artistry. It is by no means—perhaps was never intended to be—a materialization of Kipling's ideal. Compared with that it might be found lacking in animal vigor and the recklessness of a red-blooded Bohemianism. But if more subdued in coloring, it is suggestive of mental and moral fibres superior to those of the original. The character, if it loses somewhat in respect of picturesque realism, gains more from the refinement and intellectuality which are inseparable from this actor's methods. All the finer traits—the capacity for devotion, the zeal for artistic truth, sturdy independence, and cheerful self-sacrificing courage in affliction—are brought into strong relief. Especially impressive, as examples of thoughtful and highly artistic acting, are the scenes in the studio, where, in a condition of semi-delirious exaltation, induced by mental strain and drink, Heldar puts the final touches to his Melancholia, and soon afterwards is stricken blind. Robertson's portrayal of the physical terror caused by the sudden darkness and of the struggle of a proud and brave man to rally against impending moral collapse is very moving and real. He acts with admirable intuition also in the closing episode of the reconcillation with the repentant Maisie, but no skill can rob this incident of its hopeless conventionality and feebleness. The logical ending of such a story must be more or less tragic. It is a pity that Mr. Kipling should ever have condescended, against his better judgment, to violate an artistic principle, in order to gratify, at any cost, the silly popular craving for "happy endings." He, at any rate, could have afforded to refuse his consent to a foolishness of which an adapter would be sure to take advantage.

Ethel Warwick will soon produce in London a new play which has been written for her by Robert Vansittart, author of "The Cap and Bells." The name of it is "People Like Ourselves," and it is described as a study of London life, social and political. Three of the principal characters belong to a family of parvenus. There is the father, a part to be played by Frederick Kerr, who also figures as "producer"; there is the mother, a character for Lottie Venne, and there is the son, represented by Kenneth Douglas, in whom the first two have centred their hopes of social advancement. Everything that money can accomplish has been done to make him a finished gentleman. He has been educated at Eton, he is now an officer in a crack regiment, yet, to the horror of his parents, he falls in love with, and becomes engaged to, an actress, the character specially designed for Miss Warwick. In the end, of course, the heroine proves to be the good genius of the story and the saviour of the family.

Ethel Irving, the prominent English actress, who recently failed to please in "Years of Discretion," is now making preparations for a revival of "La Tosca" upon a most elaborate scale.

Hugh Robinson and Kenelm Foss are possessors of the manuscript of a three-act comedy by G. K. Chesterton. This they have carried to Miss Gertrude Kingston, and, by arrangement with her, the piece is to be produced at the Little Theatre, in London, about the middle of next month. The author describes his work as a fantastic comedy.

"The Woodlanders," the new Wessex play adapted from Thomas Hardy's story by A. Evans, with the author's consent, will be produced at Dorchester Corn Exchange, in England, on November 19 and 20, with a matinée the second day. This is the sixth play of the series acted by the Dorchester players. One, "The Three Wayfarers," was written for them by Mr. Hardy himself. Mr. Harry Tilly is coach and stage manager. A performance will also be given at the Cripplegate Institute, London, on December 8.

THE VERDI CENTENARY.

When the death of Verdi was announced, in 1901, Eduard Grieg wrote an article in Verdens Gang in which he said: "In Verdi the last of the great ones has departed. If artistic greatness could properly be compared, I would say that Verdi is greater than Bellini, Rossini, and Donizetti. Yes, I would say that he, by the side of Wagner, was the greatest dramatist of the century."

This judgment of Verdi is much more widely prevalent in the musical world than it was at the time when the great Norwegian composer expressed it. It is also now generally conceded that Verdi's "Aïda" is the greatest of all Italian operas. Yet time was when at least one New York musical critic had to chide the public annually for neglecting this masterwork. It did not become a favorite in New York until Lillian Nordica and Emma Eames impersonated the title part at the Metropolitan Opera House. At the present time we usually hear Johanna Gadski or Emmy Destinn in that rôle, with Caruso as Radames; but that the music itself now hath charms to entice the public even in the absence of such costly singers was shown a few weeks ago by the pecuniary success of the nine performances at the Century Opera House.

Rossini, if we may judge by his "William Tell," which marks so large an advance over his earlier works, might have written as great a work as "Aïda" had he not voluntarily arrested his development, passing the last thirty-eight of his seventy-six years in idleness. It can hardly be said that Verdi was a model of industry; but he continued to compose intermittently till eight years before his death at the ripe age of eighty-eight; and it was during the last thirty-eight years of his life that he wrote his best operas, half-a-dozen of which have survived to proclaim his glory a hundred years after his birth, which occurred on October 10, 1813, five months after the birth of Richard Wagner.

It is an interesting coincidence that the greatest dramatic composers of Italy and Germany were born in the same year. Nor were their musical careers as unlike as is commonly believed. It is assumed that, whereas Wagner met with fierce opposition from beginning to end, Verdi always swam with the current. But this is a mistake. From the beginning, Verdi had occasional reverses, and when the first of his great operas, "Rigoletto," was produced, in 1851, one critic declared that it had "not the slightest chance of maintaining itself in the repertory." The London Times said that to enter into an analysis of the opera "would be a loss of time and space," while the Athenæum remarked that "the opening ball scene, . . . the abduction finale, the scene between Rigoletto and the courtiers, and the storm in the last act are alike miserable in their meagre patchiness and want of meaning." Like Wagner, too, Verdi was accused innumerable times of maltreating the human voice and of being unmelodious in his music. At the Leipzig Conservatory, wrote Grieg, "there was, in the fifties and sixties, nothing but a scornful smile and a haughty shrug for Verdi. The learned masters regarded his music as bad because they did not understand its national character."

It has often been observed that the critics and other professional musicians abused Wagner for the very things we now admire in him most. That the same thing happened to Verdi is not so well known. A striking instance is the Athenæum's judgment on "Rigoletto," just cited. The storm music described by the English critic as "patchy" and "meaningless" is a superb exhibition of realism, by far the finest thing of its kind done up to that time by any Italian composer. Wagner himself could hardly have improved on those weird orchestral outbursts, and the effect is marvellously intensified by the grewsome chromatic moaning of the invisible chorus, strikingly like the dismal howling of the wind. And the most remarkable thing about this masterstroke of genius is that it was composed before Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," with its splendid storm music, had been heard anywhere except at Dresden. Certainly Verdi had not heard it; and altogether he was in many ways surprisingly "Wagnerian," quite independently of Wagner. As early as 1844, when "Ernani," which gave him his European fame, was rehearsing, he refused the demand of the prima donna for a final rondo in which she might display her vocal fireworks. "Do you wish," he exclaimed angrily, "to ruin the finest situation in the opera?"

While he did not, like his German colleague, entirely write his own texts, he nearly always had a hand in the choice of subjects, and usually sketched out the situations and the action so completely that little was left for the librettist except the versifying. He made grievous mistakes, and some were fatal to his efforts. Others were not, notably "Il Trovatore," which was for a generation the most popular of operas, in spite of its foolish and incomprehensible libretto. But so rich was its melodic vein that the singers, the public, and the commentators alike overlooked the fact that there is also in this opera a genuine dramatic vein, culminating in the musical portrayal of Azucena, "the living embodiment of rude tiger-motherhood." "Nay, but it takes a confounded amount of genius to create a figure like that!" exclaimed the late W. F. Apthorp, who had a happy faculty of coming to the rescue of ill-understood works of art.

Those accents were new to the world, and while "La Traviata," which followed "Il Trovatore," was a sad relapse into operatic conventionalism, "Aïda" more than atoned for that error. It combines, with a wealth of genuinely dramatic melody, a rare gift of local color. Still more remarkable, in point of realism, sincerity, and finish of style, are the two operas last on the list, "Otello" and "Falstaff"; but, unfortunately, they lack the melodic spontaneity of "Aïda" and "Il Trovatore" and have therefore never been really popular, notwithstanding all the passionate appeals made in their behalf by students of technical refinements. These two operas have had much influence on Wolf-Ferrari and some of the German and French composers; whereas Mascagni, Leoncavallo, and Puccini benefited more by the vigorous, virile style of Verdi's earlier operas, which made them contrast so strongly with the saccharine and florid productions of Donizetti and Rossini and the languorous femininity of Bellini. Altogether, Verdi's influence on the world's art has made for sanity and sincerity, and for this as well as for his inspired works he deserves all the honors that are coming to him in this centenarian season.

When was Verdi born? According to the best American Dictionaries of Music (De Bekker, Baker, Hughes), it was on October 9, 1813. But Grove, Riemann, the Encyclopædia Britannica, Meyer's Konversationslexicon, etc., give October 10 as the date; and October 10 is correct. In Arthur Pougin's "Anecdotic History of Verdi's Life and Works" (Scribner), which is the best biography of Verdi so far issued, attention is called to the fact that in 1884 the Gazetta Musicale, of Milan, printed a facsimile (reproduced by Pougin), of the official certificate of the birth of Verdi, extracted from the registers of the état civil of the commune of Busseta for October, 1813. This certificate is drawn up in French, as that part of Italy was at that time under French rule. It attests that on October 12 of that year there appeared before the officials——

Verdi, Charles, aged twenty-eight years, innkeeper, domiciled at Roncole, who presented to us a child of the male sex, born the tenth of the present month, at eight o'clock in the evening, of him the deponent, and of Luisa Utini, spinner, domiciled at Roncole, his wife, and to whom he has declared that he wishes to give the forenames of Joseph-Fortunin-François.

The Programme Book of the thirty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1912-13) makes a volume with 1,598 pages. Many of these are filled with advertisements, but there is so much good reading matter that in spite of its width, the volume deserves space in every musical library, private or public. The present editor, Philip Hale, pays a tribute of respect to his predecessor, the late W. F Apthorp, who "was proud of his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and strove that his share in the work should be of the same standard and make for musical righteousness." His desire was that a symphony or overture should be studied with the aid of his analysis after the performance. "It did not flatter him to see hearers reading while the music was playing." It must be said that while Mr. Apthorp's programme notes were admirable in most respects there was too much "parsing" in them—technical analysis intelligible to those only who did not need it. From this fault Mr. Hale's notes are free; he gives, chiefly, information which prepares the listener for what he is about to hear, and his information is always readable and never too technical. Footnotes are Mr. Hale's hobby. He is so passionately addicted to them that he devotes four pages to a special index of them. The "Entr'actes and Excursions," designed to entertain Bostonians during the ten-minute intermission at each concert, are concerned with subjects as diverse as Beethoven as Pianist, Dancing in Spain and Vienna, Haydn in Paris, Masscnet's Souvenirs, Indian Music, Offenbach, Rag-time, Dramatic Expression in the Concert-room, etc.

The Kneisel Quartet announces that the opening concert of the twenty-second season in New York will be given at New Aeolian Hall on Tuesday evening, November 11. The remaining dates in the series will be December 9, January 13, February 10, March 3, and April 7. Among the works by contemporary composers to be placed on these programmes will be Vincent D'Indy's Quartet in E major, op. 45, Chadwick's Quartet in D minor, No. 5, and the Scherzo from the Quartet, op. 38, by A. Bruno, which has not yet been published.

Humperdinck has at last found a name for his new opera—"Die Marketenderin" ("The Camp Follower"). The orchestration has just been completed, and the opera is ready for production. The scene is laid in Blücher's headquarters, 1813-14. Blücher and Gneisenau appear in the cast, but unlike the other principals, they simply speak their parts. The two principal happenings are the march of the Silesian army after the battle of Leipzig and Blücher's crossing of the Rhine at Kaub.

Art

Lovers and collectors of book-plates—and they are not few in number—will be pleased to learn that a monograph on the engraver Sherborn, who died last year, has just been issued, with the title: "A Sketch of the Life and Work of Charles William Sherborn, Painter-Etcher, by his son, Charles Davies Sherborn. With a catalogue of his book-plates, compiled by himself and Georgo Heath Viner" (London: Ellis). The biographical portion, as is said in the preface, tells the "details of a singularly simple life, but one in which devotion to art became a religion." The book will take its place beside I. H. Brainerd's volume on our own E. D. French.

Mr. C. H. Caffin's attempt to overhaul Julia D. de Forest's "A Short History of Art" (Dodd, Mead & Company, illustrated) seems labor thrown away. Originally the book was a rather dry epitome from authorities now obsolete. In revision it has gained very little either in leading ideas or in accuracy. There is no adequate statement of the present condition of the Byzantine problem, and the important discovery of a Roman revival of painting just prior to Giotto is passed by. The description of fresco painting, ungrammatically called "in secco," is incomplete and misleading. Of course, the old error that Leonardo's Cenacolo was painted in oils is repeated, though Cavenaghi six years ago showed that tempera was the medium. As a Cimabue is reproduced a Madonna painted a full generation after that master's death. Antonello da Messina remains a "pupil of the Van Eycks." The cuts and captions of a Paul Dubois and a Rodin are interchanged. Apparently, the book is calculated for some public among which ideas count for very little and accuracy not at all. Young ladies' schools, be advised.

A new and cheaper edition of Sir Walter Armstrong's translation of Wölfflin's admirable "The Art of the Renaissance" (Putnam) should rejoice the heart of every teacher of Italian art. One of the most illuminating treatises of our times now becomes available as a textbook. The reissue, though not too large to fit in the tourist's pocket, retains all of the original illustrations.

By carefully watching certain building excavations in Seville Bernhard and Ellen Wishaw gathered a considerable collection of potteries, figurines, and architectural fragments. Combining these with a collection of Andalusian lace, they have set up a little museum, the "Illustrated Descriptive Catalogue" of which now appears, in a pamphlet with the imprint of Smith, Elder & Co. The most interesting finds represent a Tartessian civilization which the authors believe to be similar in type and perhaps identical in date with the Minoan, but there are also many objects of Moorish and later periods. There are descriptions of subterranean fanes and labyrinths at Seville that will whet the curiosity of all antiquarians. The illustrative material is insufficient for the appraisal either of the theories or the collections of these zealous archæologists, but enough is shown to prove that they have recovered many objects of enigmatic and novel type. We regret the delay that must probably intervene before we may present ourself at Angeles 5, Seville.

To the long and rapidly growing list of books on English mediæval architecture issued in late years by Henry Frowde there has now been added a volume by A. Hamilton Thompson on "English Mediæval Military Architecture." In an octavo of 367 pages of text, with 200 illustrations, Mr. Thompson traces the historical evolution in England of the fully developed mediæval castle through each successive stage from its origin in the pre-Roman earthworks; while special chapters treat of the Norman keep, the later cylindrical keeps or donjons, the dwelling-house in the castle, the concentric plan, the later mediæval fortifications, including city walls, and the fortified dwelling or manor. Foreign examples like Coucy, Carcassonc, and the Mont St. Michel are referred to by way of comparison and illustration; and from the remarkable articles on French military architecture in the "Dictionnaire Raisonné" of Viollet-le-Duc have been taken a number of spirited drawings, which add materially to the interest of the discussion of mediæval military operations. All the most important castles of England are more or less fully described, and most of them illustrated by excellent photographic prints. The numerous pen sketches are of quite uneven merit. The plans are good as far as they go, but there should have been more of them, e. g., of Rochester, Newark, Raglan, Warkworth, and Warwick castles. The subject is one of purely historical and archæological interest, and its treatment must perhaps of necessity be somewhat dry, especially for the American reader, for whom the feudal architecture of England lacks the patriotic and romantic attraction it naturally holds for the English. Certainly Mr. Thompson has failed to infuse into his very detailed technical discussion the slightest flavor of romance, of historical picturesqueness, or of literary elegance. The contrast of his style and method with Viollet-le-Duc's briefer treatment of the parallel development in France is striking in this respect: the French account is full of animation. In Mr. Thompson's work the broader aspects of the subject are buried under a mass of details. These, however, are carefully studied, and no other single volume in the same field combines so complete a survey of the whole subject with detailed information regarding so many castles. The bibliography and two indexes are very full; but there should also have been provided an index of illustrations.

Finance

PRESENT STATUS OF THE BANKING BILL.

After what appears to have been a fair and open discussion, the National Bankers' Convention at Boston last week adopted resolutions asking for several modifications in the banking and currency bill now pending before Congress. These resolutions, which received the virtually unanimous endorsement of the 2,400 delegates, approve the recommendations of last August's Bankers' Conference at Chicago. They argue that, to insure the success of any new system such as is contemplated, the general approval and coöperation of existing banks must be obtained, and they declare that such coöperation will be impossible without certain amendments to the bill. But the resolutions also formally commend the Administration for its "efforts to give the country an elastic, as well as a safe, currency," and pledge "hearty support for the enactment of proper legislation to that end."

As was pointed out in this column last week, the salient objections to the banking bill as it stands—objections set forth by the Chicago conference, and now ratified by the Boston Convention—are four in number. The national board of seven, all of whom, under the bill, would be either Government officers or Presidential appointees, should contain, the Convention holds, a minority of three, named by the regional reserve banks. National banks should not, as in the present bill, be required to join the system and subscribe to the capital of the regional reserve banks; membership should be optional. The national board should not be empowered to require rediscount of one regional reserve bank's paper by another. Finally, note issues should be described in the Act, not as obligations of the United States, but as "obligations of the Federal reserve banks, issued by permission of the Federal Reserve Board."

The action of the Bankers' Convention and the trend of the discussion which preceded it, indicate strongly the necessity for further consideration of the bill, with a view to reaching, if possible, a ground on which both the banks and the Government can stand. The case cannot fairly be described as one in which the banks are defying the Government or endeavoring to dictate to it. That the banks have shown themselves unwilling to accept certain provisions which the Administration wishes to impose, is plain enough. But it will not help the situation to assume that this reluctance of the banks is based on determination to keep the control of the system in the hands of the banking institutions. The summary of the proposed alterations in the bill, which we have made above, shows that the banks do not ask for this, and that, if all their suggestions were adopted, they still would not have obtained it. The only change suggested in the executive clauses of the bill is one which, while giving the banks indirect representation on the national board, would still leave it a minority representation.

Perhaps it is open to some doubt whether the banks would obtain by this means as effective a voice in the policies of that body as they would obtain by a reasonable enlargement of the functions of the advisory council of bankers, proposed in the bill. But with regard to the Convention's appeal for some representation on the Federal Reserve Board, there is thus much of valid argument: that the Board is to have certain sweeping powers over the policies of the regional reserve banks, to which the individual banks will have subscribed the necessary capital, yet that the subscribers of that capital will have no voice in determining such policies. It is this which differentiates the proposed scheme of national supervision from such bodies of purely political appointees as the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is in this respect, also, that the parallel with European central banks under government-named directorates fails of exact application. The European banks are equipped through private or governmental capital.

The weight of the controversy will undoubtedly rest very largely on the question of the national board. The strength of the bankers' contention lies in the fact that at least the presence of expert bankers in the deliberations of the central board, which may dictate the use of capital subscribed by the banks, ought to be insured; the strength of the Government's contention lies in the fact that control of the system by any group of banks would be rendered impracticable by the political composition of that board. The weakness of the bankers' argument lay in the public knowledge of the extent to which the country's banking machinery had in the past been influenced by such financial groups; the weakness of the Government's argument, under existing circumstances, lay in the fact that, without the coöperation of the individual banks, the whole experiment might prove to be a failure; for nothing can absolutely prevent withdrawal of banks from the national system.

Such being the case, it should seem that the situation calls for statesmanlike compromise between the ideas of the bankers and the Government. This does not mean, and the Boston Convention has not asked, the relinquishment of the Government's effective power, through majority representation, over the national board. But some middle ground ought to be attainable in the matter, through which there may be insured both the Government's predominant supervisory power and the cooperation of the banks as a whole in making the new system a success. The object to be attained by such compromise is the success of the Administration's plan, which might be jeopardized if the existing deadlock is not broken.

It must not be overlooked that the Convention has by implication approved the general machinery and detailed provisions of the bill. The other criticisms of the report involve problems both of opinion and of practice, in which the existing provisions are susceptible of modifications. Compulsory membership in the system by national banks and compulsory subscription to the stock of the regional reserve banks are, in some ways, the most important of them, yet both of these could be met with the least surrender of principle. The Aldrich plan made such membership and subscription optional; but, since its provisions for redemption of the 2 per cent. Government bonds, pledged against circulation, were to apply only to member banks, it was regarded by its author as insuring membership by all the national banks. If membership in the present case were to be made optional, a similar restriction of provisions for the bonds to member banks would presumably be inevitable.

The Promise of the Christ Age in Recent Literature

By WILLIAM EUGENE MOSHER, Ph.D.

12*mo.* $1.25 net. By mail, $1.40.

An analysis and interpretation from the viewpoint of religious significance of ten recent works by authors of international standing. The representative character of such dramatists and novelists as Lagerlof, Hauptmann, Rostand, Kennedy, etc., together with the widespread popularity of the works treated, justifies the author in attributing to them symptomatic significance. In spite of widely divergent themes and methods of treatment, each writer either aims to present Christ in His own person or finds the virtue power for his chief character in the direct influence of Christ's personality and teaching.

The Masters of Modern French Criticism

By IRVING BABBITT

A survey of the intellectual life of France during the nineteenth century.

"Un livre exceptionnellement remarquable . . . Ce livre indiquerait-il que la race anglo-saxonne, dans ce milieu nouveau et avec le concours des autres énergies qui y sont entrées en fusion avec elle, commence à développer des facultés inconnues dans la métropole d'origine? Ou dois-je seulement y voir la manifestation d'un esprit particulièrement doué et équipé pour les besognes les plus hautes et les plus arduos de la critique par une culture cosmopolite et, en quelque sorte, universelle? Même dans ce cas et en ne considérant pas M. Babbitt comme représentant, à aucun degré, les idées américaines et l'esprit américain, il me semble impossible que l'enseignement de ce rare esprit ne contribue à créer autour de lui, dans la région universitaire, une élite intellectuelle. A tous égards, ce livre est un symptôme. Il nous rappelle, si nous le savions déjà, il apprend à ceux qui l'ignoraient qu'il faut, dans le monde des idées, compter avec la patrie d'Emerson."—AUGUSTIN FILON, in Le Journal des Débats.

EDWARD HOWARD GRIGGS

The Philosophy of Art

What is Art? What does Art do to the artist who creates? What does Art do to the student who appreciates? These questions underlie this work which deals with sculpture, painting, music and poetry. The author's purpose and method may be comprehended from his remark that it is "not a restatement of criticism and philosophy, but the condensed result of twenty-five years' study of works of art in each of the four fields, recording and interpreting what these masterpieces have done to my senses, emotions, imagination and intellect."

PAUL HERVIEU

The Labyrinth

This represents the best in modern French drama. James Huneker speaks of it as "a great section of throbbing, real life." "In no other play has Hervieu attained and preserved so great a height of sympathetic and passionate emotional power, nor exposed the relentless working out of human motives struggling with forces greater than themselves; nowhere else has he sustained his interest and developed his story simultaneously, with so sure a hand," says Mr. Clark in the introduction. He reviews Hervieu's dramas, outlines his life and offers a condensed but valuable bibliography.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

*Marriage and Divorce

Mr. Holmes is too wise to try to solve the divorce problem, but, recognizing unalterable facts of human nature on the one hand, and shifting social institutions on the other, he reviews the opposing attitudes and, with no compromise as to principles, offers a middle ground acceptable to a progressive day. The author is minister of the Church of the Messiah, New York.

TEMPLE SCOTT

*The Use of Leisure

This book will be enjoyed even by those who rebel against its social and economic implications. Mr. Scott not only tells how to utilize the leisure we now have, but demands more, and then he tells what to do with that. The three headings of the book are suggestive: "Wanted—Leisure;" "The Right Use of Leisure;" "Work, the Creator."

AUGUST STRINDBERG

By the Open Sea

This is Strindberg's best novel. The characters develop in lifelike fashion through their words and deeds, while the background is woven from the lives of the fisherfolk into a striking tapestry of revenge, love, hate, prejudice and superstition. The unfolding of the hero's mind as it responds to modern scientific thought, and the psychology as worked out in Marie's life, are notable accomplishments. The book contributes delightfully to the nature life of the North—its fish, vegetation, rocks, its mirages and winds and waters. This aspect of Strindberg will be new to those who know only his dramatic and self-revelatory works.

The Streak By DAVID POTTER

Illustrated. $1.25 net. Postpaid $1.37.

David Potter, who recently spent five years in the Philippines, has caught in this story the real spirit of the "Islands." "The Streak" is to them what Kipling's "Kim" is to India. It is a big tale, realistic, romantic, and sensuous—a swiftly moving romance in which elementary passions are in conflict with the ideals of American civilization, centering around Ann Nelson, a beautiful Southern girl, and Major Crittenden, a splendid American officer.

Diana Ardway — BY VAN ZO POST.

Illustrated in color by Gayle Hoskins. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25 net. Postpaid $1.37.

This unconventional love story is a tale of primitive passions in modern characters. The author pictures scenes and people with startling frankness. It is a riot of life and love—bubbling over with wit—quick in action.

Ruth Anne — BY ROSE CULLEN BRYANT.

Illustrated by Will Grefe. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25 net. Postpaid $1.37.

The splendid humanness of this story will give great enjoyment to all who do not care for novels of the wishy-washy type. It is a love story of rare naturalness, uplifting in its outlook upon life, and the romance of Ruth Anne and Dr. Hollander is one of subtle beauty.

Thorley Weir — BY E. F. BENSON.

12mo. Cloth, $1.35 net. Postpaid $1.50.

Mr. Benson's novels are remarkable for their lucidity of expression as well as their depth of insight into human relations. This new story is both grave and gay, and the author talks well about things that really matter.

By the Author of "From the Car Behind"

The Unafraid — BY ELEANOR M. INGRAM.

Three illustrations in color by Edmund Frederick. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25 net. Postpaid $1.37.

Readers of Miss Ingram's automobile racing story, "From the Car Behind," will remember with pleasure the American impetuosity of that tale. The new novel is written in the same lively style. It is a joyous, dashing, care-killing story—a characteristic Ingram achievement.

Edited by WILL DAVID HOWE, Professor and Head of the Department of English, Indiana University.

12mo, cloth, lxix+398 pages, $1.20.

THESE essays, each complete in itself, have been carefully selected from the works of William Hazlitt. They show this delightful personal essayist at his best as a critic of painting, of poetry, of books, and of men. They take us back to the theatre in the days of Kean, Siddons, and the Kemhles; they give us the flavor of the evenings at the rooms of Charles and Mary Lamh. Few volumes of selections contain more instructive criticism, more brilliant writing, or a more stimulating philosophy of life than is included in this collection of representative essays.

In one volume, crown 8vo, 300 pages, with photogravure portrait.

During the forty-one years in which he edited the Nation, with a thoroughness, ability, and conscientious devotion unsurpassed in the records of American journalism, Mr. Garrison was an indefatigable correspondent, never employing an amanuensis, but writing tens of thousands of letters with his own hand to his contributors, who embraced practically all the leading American scholars and critics of the period. From a dozen groups of these, which have been kindly loaned hy the recipients, a sufficient number of selections has been made to illustrate the relations hetween Mr. Garrison and his great corps of contributors, the frankness and tact which he exercised towards them, and the wide range of his interests, tastes, and sympathies. The volume also contains a brief sketch of his life, a dozen of his best poems, and several of his characteristic editorials, reviews, and essays, hesides a fine photogravure portrait.

By JOHN M. MANLY and JOHN A. POWELL

A book designed to aid authors and all others who are concerned with the writing of English. It aims to answer the practical questions that constantly arise in the preparation of manuscripts for the printer, business letters, and any sort of composition where correctness of form is an important element.

It treats in a clear and convenient way the matters of grammar, spelling, and general form which writers need most to be informed about, and gives full directions on the preparation of "copy" for the printer and the correcting of proof. The chapter on letter-writing is unique and gives just the help that is constantly wanted and that other manuals deny.

No More Monthly Payments. Increase in Price of $29.00

A Radical Departure is About to Be Made in the Plan of Sale of

The New Encyclopaedia Britannica 11th Edition

(Published by the Cambridge University Press)

Now Sold Direct to the Public

Hereafter it will be obtainable

—through agents and booksellers only —for cash payment only (complete sets or volume by volume)
—no longer for monthly payments

The difference will be —An increase of $29.00—$5.75 instead of $4.75 a volume

—An immediate outlay of the full cash price instead of only $5.00

THE FINAL DATE Formal announcement is hereby made of the termination of the sale at the present low prices and for monthly payments. In England the closing date will be December 22nd, and in the United States and Canada very shortly thereafter.

Your only safe plan is to sign and mail, now, the order form on the opposite page of this announcement if you want to get the book before it costs $29.00 more.

TOO MANY of the public this inevitable change in the conditions of sale will present itself in this simple form: "It is now easy, and will be then almost impossible, for me to secure a work which I long since determined to obtain sooner or later."

The success of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica, of which 51,243 copies (1,486,047 volumes) have already been sold, has made the existing system of small monthly payments so familiar that its discontinuance may, at first glance, seem to be a sudden and violent disturbance of established usage. But it should be remembered that every advertisement of the work has explicitly described the current offer as provisional, and the price as temporary, and subject to increase by stages until it reached the normal figure of $7.50 per volume, i.e., the price at which the 7th, 8th and 9th editions were sold. The increase to $5.75 a volume which has been fixed to take effect in England as from December 22nd, and very shortly thereafter in this country, marks a stage in this upward process.

A last opportunity before the price is raised and the facility of making small monthly payments is withdrawn

As all those who have been contemplating the purchase of the new edition have been told that the offer at $4.75 a volume was temporary, it could hardly be considered a hardship if the change to $5.75 per volume, and the abolition of the instalment system, were effected at a day's notice. But that course has not been adopted. Provision has been made for those who have been intending to subscribe but have not yet done so.

Before the change takes place, a last opportunity will be given to subscribe at the present low prices and to obtain immediate delivery of the volumes (and of the bookcase if desired) for monthly payments of only $5.00.

Why the Change Is Made at This Time

A reader who thinks that it would suit him better to purchase the Encyclopaedia Britannica on the monthly payment system and at the low price next year, than to do so now, may wonder why the sale should not be continued under the present conditions.

The employment of the large capital required for instalment sales, and the minimizing of profit entailed by exceptionally low prices, are expedient in the case of a new work of which the contents are so voluminous and so varied that they cannot adequately be represented by advertisements. On the other hand, the rapid distribution of a large number of copies upon unusually attractive terms firmly establishes the reputation of the work. Now that this has been done, a continuous, though slower, sale through booksellers and agents is more profitable and less troublesome. On the one hand, those who most need the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and those to whom its acquisition in the ordinary way would be most difficult, have already subscribed or can at once subscribe. On the other hand, it is now better known, more highly appreciated, and more constantly used than any other book to which the 20th century has given birth.

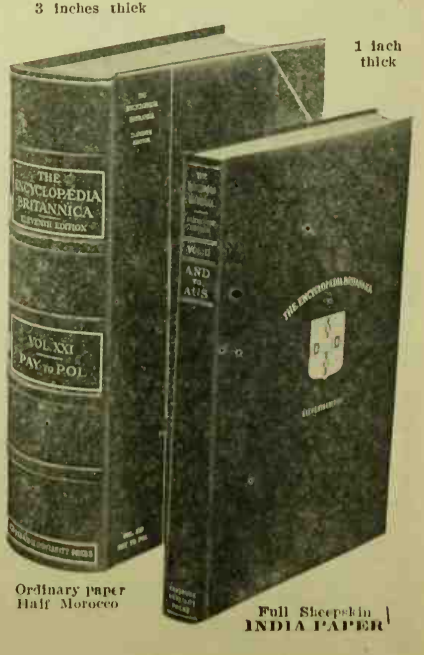
The Object Achieved, the Offer Closes

The editor completed a great achievement when he passed the volumes for press. Its publishers have now accomplished the equally necessary task of introducing the volumes in all parts of the world. And, after this final subscription sale, those who want the Encyclopaedia Britannica must buy it and pay for it as they buy and pay for any other book.

There are, doubtless, some intending purchasers who have delayed because they would like first to convince themselves concerning certain points such as cannot be covered in any general description. In particular, a reader may argue that his hesitation does not in the least call in question the value of the book, only his capacity to profit by it. "A series of volumes in which leading specialists collaborate to answer any question that can reasonably be asked should be invaluable. Will it prove so in my case? Shall I, in fact, use it when I have it?" Only actual examination and use of the volumes themselves can satisfy the desire to be reassured on this point.

"Conditional Purchase"

It has accordingly been decided that the wishes of those who truly seek an answer to this question will best be fulfilled by permitting conditional purchase, i. e., the subscriber holds himself free to return the volumes after ten days' use and claim a refund of $3.75 from the $5.00 sent with his order. The reader who would subscribe with this proviso must endorse the order form "Conditional Purchase." On no account will the privilege be granted to those who order without such endorsement, since it is essential that the precise number of copies supplied on these terms should be known.



THE NEW ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA 11TH EDITION

Closing of the subscription lists for the New ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA—11th Edition, 29 volumes, published by the Cambridge University Press, of England. Price to be increased from $29 to $50, according to the binding. No more monthly payments.

THE MOST WONDERFUL BOOK IN THE WORLD

1. Eleven Editions: a Century and a Half of Development

No more striking evidence could be given of the immense expansion of knowledge in modern times than the growth of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The three volumes of the first edition (1768), mainly the work of a single hand, have grown to 29 volumes in the 11th edition, the outcome of collaboration among some 1,500 distinguished specialists. And this growth of the Encyclopaedia Britannica is an indication also of the extent to which the need of such a work has increased with the expansion of knowledge. If a book of this kind was in demand 145 years ago, when a useful account of knowledge could be given in three volumes, how much more is such a resource needed to-day, when the required information occupies almost ten times as many volumes?

2. A Nearer Approach to Perfection

Besides the growth that naturally accompanies the increase of knowledge, each successive edition shows also an internal improvement upon its predecessor. The instrument is ever perfecting itself, until we come to the present edition, and to an advance for which the whole history of encyclopaedias affords no measure. Apart altogether from the immense superiority of its compact and handy format, the 11th edition excels all previous books of the kind in the following points:—(a) it is more thoroughly and consistently abreast of its times, (b) it will appeal to the reader as more exhaustive, and (c) to the inquirer as easier of reference.

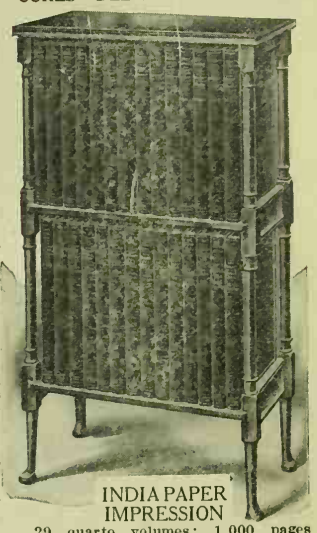
3. An Advantage Peculiar to this Edition

These and other improvements — which may all be included in the general statement that the 11th edition is more systematic than its predecessors—are the result of a circumstance peculiar to the preparation of the 11th edition. For the first time in the making of an extensive work, the whole book was planned and executed as one consistent whole, and no part of it was printed and published until the whole material from A to Z was assembled.

4. More Useful Because More Systematic

The 11th edition, therefore, is no mere revision but a new work founded upon a fresh survey. It is singularly easy of reference because, in every case, a separate article is accorded to the topic upon which the inquirer seeks information, whereas previously it was too often lost in an "omnibus" article of inordinate length. It is extraordinarily exhaustive, because these separate articles were not written independently and at haphazard, according to the exigencies of the alphabet and the particular volume in preparation, but in pursuance of a well considered scheme planned to meet the demands of the whole subject.

Whether he turn to its pages for the answer to a specific question or for enlightenment upon the whole of a great subject, the reader will find the 11th edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica more useful, more thorough, more interesting, than he could have imagined possible in a work of such immense scope, or than he could have expected from his acquaintance with any other cucyclopaedia whatever.



INDIA PAPER IMPRESSION

29 quarto volumes; 1,000 pages each; 44,000,000 words; 400 plates; 7,000 other illustrations; 300 maps. Occupying a cubic space of only 2 ft.

5. A Revolution in Form

The immense growth of knowledge renders an encyclopaedia more of a necessity to-day than ever before. For the same reason, a book which to-day affords a thorough answer to any question that can reasonably be asked must inevitably be voluminous.

The contents of the 11th edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica would fill between 400 and 500 ordinary octavo books. Printed, as previous editions were printed, on ordinary paper, the 29 quarto volumes make a row 7 feet long. The ever-increasing bulk of the Encyclopaedia Britannica promised to become a serious menace to its usefulness. The present edition was already far advanced towards completion when a member of the editorial staff, rebelling at the thought that all the precious material passing through his hands was destined to be buried in volumes too cumbersome for easy reading, urged the employment of India paper. The idea was unheard of. Nothing larger than an octavo Bible had ever been printed on India paper. Seldom, however, has a revolutionary change found more complete justification in the event.

The use of India paper has resulted in light, slender, elegant volumes, inviting for reference, a pleasure to read; and the whole 44 million words go into a cubic space of only 2 feet. The greater need of the day for an encyclopaedia has been met by a work which surpasses in usefulness all earlier editions, not only by reason of the more exhaustive and systematic character of its contents, but also in virtue of its compact and infinitely more usable form.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th Edition, is copyright in all countries subscribing to the Bern Convention by the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Cambridge

INDIA PAPER AND ORDINARY PAPER

The extraordinary compactness, flexibility, and lightness of the India paper edition, in its various bindings (occupying a cubic space of but 2 feet), immediately appealed to the general public. Of the 51,000 sets already bought, 91½ per cent. have been on India paper, and only 8½ per cent. on ordinary paper, the same as that used for the old 9th edition, and those are chiefly for public institutions.

THE BINDINGS Of the bindings, the dark red full morocco edition forms the handsomest addition to any library, worthy a collection of the most expensively bound books; the dark green sheepskin, by its extreme flexibility, the ease with which it is handled, and its comely appearance, has proved by far the most popular with the general public; the cloth binding has been regarded as entirely satisfactory by those who had to choose the cheapest form.

There is also a beautiful binding (India paper) in full limp velvet suede, Prayer Book style, round corners, gilt edges. Having extreme flexibility, being lined with leather, the backs may be folded back against each other and the volume may be doubled up and slipped into a coat pocket.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1913.

The Week

President Wilson's prediction of the enactment of the banking law in the present session may or may not be well-grounded. In their comment on the President's letter to Mr. Underwood three of the twelve members of the Senate Finance Committee declare such a result to be impossible, and three others are skeptical about it. In any case, the possibility of such rapid work, in the five weeks remaining to the extra session, will depend on the character of the amendments made in the Committee, before the bill is reported to the Senate. The recent trend of opinion has undoubtedly been to the effect, first, that the existence of certain serious defects in the bill as it passed the House has been recognized by most of the Senators, and, second, that neither Congress nor the Administration is unwilling to have amendments fully and fairly considered. This attitude, which differs from that which, rightly or wrongly, was ascribed to the bill's promoters a month or two ago, is readily accounted for by the series of frank and positive criticisms of the pending bill, since the measure passed the House, by economic writers, by bankers and business men who have testified at the Senate committee hearings, and by formal resolutions adopted by various banking and commercial organizations.

Renewed British protests against Senator Nelson's Seamen's bill, reported from the Commerce Committee on October 2, show that the measure will be opposed from two quarters. The attitude of American shipowners, however, has been discounted since last year, when the bill passed only to suffer a "pocket veto" by President Taft. Under Senator La Follette's threat of introducing a more drastic measure, their surrender could probably be obtained. As to the general intent of the bill, there can be little doubt. Aimed at raising the admittedly low standard of seamen's labor, it would bind shipowners to provide better accommodations, would enable the seaman to leave a ship where he was ill-treated, would compel regular wage settlements, and make towards better hours and better pay. If foreign shipowners protest against its "encouragement to desertion," they should remember that in other fields of labor the employer's guarantee lies in making it to his employee's interest to stay with him.

So short is memory, and so ungrateful are republics, that people might have forgotten that there once was a Secretary of State named Knox, had he not just made a speech to remind us of the fact. He was dedicating a monument to Braddock, but by an easy and graceful transition the ex-Secretary passed to a discussion of our relations with Mexico and South America. His hearers are said to have gathered that he was severely arraigning President Wilson's policy, but they must have been very acute to be able to detect this beneath Mr. Knox's generalities, which were couched in language that certainly did not glitter. He warned his audience against "the cacophonies of those who are blinded by thoughtlessness, interest, or prejudice." But this would scarcely make a good rallying cry against the Administration. How many voters would follow a banner inscribed: "Down with Cacophonies"? And if it is a question of indefiniteness and ambiguities, who could surpass Mr. Knox in laying down the rule that we are to "contribute to the unity, happiness, and prosperity of all the people" of the new world, and are to do this in "a sympathetic, practical, and unselfish way, without offence to their national amour propre or encroachment upon their sovereign powers"? Plainly, this is not a case of the oracles being dumb, but unintelligible.

A few calm distinctions seem all that it is necessary to make in Mrs. Pankhurst's case, in order to arrive at the merits of it. In the first place, the immigration authorities are not to be blamed for taking up the question of her right to admission. The challenge was directly put to them, and they could not refuse at least to inquire whether the law which they are enforcing every week against others would not, literally understood, exclude her. And they had to consider the prima-facie evidence of Mrs. Pankhurst's actual conviction in England for crime. But we have to bear in mind that the question is not raised of her being a fugitive from justice. She left England in the light of day, with the knowledge and consent of British officers of the law, and there is no suggestion that they desire to have her extradited or back in England one day earlier than she wishes to return. Quite the contrary! All this being so, the sole broad question put before the Washington authorities was whether Mrs. Pankhurst's offences, however severely to be condemned in themselves, are not political in their nature. The Administration at Washington has accepted her own description of herself as a determined rebel against her Government, and has accordingly classed her with those political refugees to whom this country has traditionally granted, not only admission, but a hearing.

What happened in the Fifth Judicial District of Illinois on Monday, when Judge Puterbaugh, Republican, with a fine record on the bench, was defeated for the Supreme Court by Charles C. Craig, Democrat, has been predictable since the split in the State suffrage convention ten days ago. The figure cut by the Progressive candidate was due entirely to the activity of a group of women supporters. Actuated by resentment at Mr. Puterbaugh's opposition to woman suffrage, they ran full-page advertisements in Peoria, Kewanee, and Streator papers, addressed dozens of mass meetings, and made general canvasses. This activity ran counter not only to the best non-partisan sentiment of the district, but to the judgment of the more moderate wing of the suffragists. The objections of this moderate wing to any party alignment of the suffragists, as well as to the injection by them of narrow issues into a judicial campaign, was ridden over by the radicals rough-shod.

A year ago, the Democratic candidate for Congress from the First West Virginia District was elected over his Progressive-Republican opponent by the narrow margin of 169 votes. Last week, with the Progressives and the Republicans divided, the Democrats won again, this time by a plurality of more than 3,500. Their vote was a little less than the combined vote of their two leading rivals. The Progressive-Republican candidate of last November was the Progressive candidate this year. Since the new party, under the leadership of Gov. Glasscock, one of the Seven, avoided a split with the Republicans in the election of last year, except on Presidential electors, the only way of comparing the Progressive strength now with what it was then is by referring to the vote cast for Roosevelt in the same district. The third-party nominee for the Presidency received 13,287 votes to Mr. Taft's 12,702. Last week Mr. Laughlin received only about 4,000 votes to his Republican opponent's 10,000. The general story of decline in the Progressive strength since 1912 is thus repeated in the latest test. If it be said that some allowance must be made for the difference between a Presidential and a Congressional election, the reply is that the Republican nominee last week polled 80 per cent. of the vote cast for Taft a year ago, while the Progressive polled less than a third of the vote cast for Roosevelt.

Everybody knows that Tammany is the poor man's friend, but we are all prone to forget in how many different ways this beneficent influence is exerted. A recent item in the police news may usefully serve as a reminder of one of them. A man named Fred Goll was brought before Magistrate Freschi by Patrolman William Jacobs. Goll is referred to in the newspaper report as "one of a band of young rowdies who had tried to make things unpleasant" for the patrolman on his post. Jacobs had found it necessary to use his revolver "to ward off his prisoner's friends on the way to the station." Presumably in view of the ugly look of this thing, the Magistrate imposed the tremendous penalty of ten dollars; but this was later reduced to one dollar. The interest of the matter, however, lies in what the patrolman stated to his superior officer in making his report of the case. "When I got into court," he said, "who should come up to me but Jimmy Hines and ask me to 'go light' on the fellow." As Hines is Tammany leader in the Nineteenth Assembly District, it is clear that in interceding for this rowdy he was acting the standard Tammany part of "poor man's friend." Some superior people may object that there are thousands of poor men, women, and children who would be helped by the suppression of rowdyism, and that to be a friend to the one rowdy is to be an enemy to a thousand who are not rowdies. But Tammany knows better. What Hines did in this one case, Tammany has been doing steadily in countless cases year after year, generation after generation, and does not its political success prove that it has been right?

Two passages in the report of John Golden, president of the United Textile Workers of America, who held their annual meeting at Philadelphia this week, strike us as interesting in themselves, and peculiarly interesting when placed in juxtaposition with each other. One of them is this:

> The indiscriminate employment of children is becoming daily more serious. And I believe it is time that the national Government enacted stringent legislation that will prevent the further exploitation of those who are to be the future bulwark of our great country.

If the statement made in the first sentence were correct, it would go far towards making a prima-facie case for the proposal of national control made in the second. But, however serious may be "the indiscriminate employment of children," the assertion that it "is becoming daily more serious" is the diametrical opposite of what all the intelligence on the subject that has been coming to the public knowledge has indicated. And here let us cite the second of the passages in his report to which we have referred:

> The States that have already adopted stringent laws regulating the working hours and wages of woman and child workers have been proved to be those which are now in the highest condition of industrial development. In every case it has been shown that increased outlay of money by the manufacturer has been more than repaid in increased efficiency, greater output, and less labor trouble.

If the leading industrial States have "already adopted stringent laws"—while, as we all know, the most backward States have, one after another, been moving in that direction—and if the result of those stringent laws has been proved to be so satisfactory to the manufacturers themselves, what becomes of the argument that a tremendous increase of national control is desperately necessary?

Those who think of Hawaii in terms of the motley population may be impressed by the tone of its recent civic convention. It was, says the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, "a practical attempt to reach the heart of municipal and territorial problems." Led by the boards of trade, the delegates took action for better roads, the setting apart of a Kilauea and Mauna Loa National Park, the building of new open-air stations for tubercular patients, and the encouragement of agriculture. But if the convention had an American spirit of civic improvement, it had also an American zeal for advertising and development. There was an Hawaii Promotion Club, subsidized by the Legislature, an "Ad Club," and similar bodies to plan, "first, to get tourists to the islands, and, secondly, to keep them entertained after they are here." The spirit of the entertainment is implicit in the sentiment: "Where but on Oahu can you see a volcanic replica of the cathedral at Milan, or in a day's journey travel through ninety miles of scenery that varies from the ruggedness of Switzerland to the simple beauty of the Blue Grass State?" Note, too, the hearty conviction that "there is no crop that responds more satisfactorily to cultivation than the tourist crop." Visitors to the islands may henceforth look for evidence of two kinds of progressiveness.

The strong approval with which Sir Rufus Isaacs's appointment as Lord Chief Justice has been received in England must gratify even the most sanguine Liberals. To the man who only four months ago was ready to resign the Attorney-Generalship in order to save his party from the effects of the Marconi scandal, and whom the Parliamentary minority report flatly censured for "grave impropriety," the present tribute to his ability and integrity must mean much. No one has ever denied that his brilliant career and tested temper have made him the indicated successor to Lord Alverstone. The new Lord Chief Justice enters upon his labors at a time when his predecessor's ill-health has left the affairs of office in much confusion; but he may feel that he has "better confirmation, better security" in it than even his friends could once have hoped.

Enterprising map-makers should be making preparations to be early in the market with a new map of Ulster. The re-mapping of the Balkans will be nothing compared with that of the Irish province, if the exclusionists have their way. Separate treatment of the four northeast counties only is denounced by the redoubtable Mr. Garvin in the Pall Mall Gazette as "light talk." He points out that there is a large Unionist population in the neighboring counties of Fermanagh and Tyrone, and it must somehow be got under the rule of "King" Carson at Belfast. And as there is also a large Nationalist population in Ulster, it would follow, by parity of reasoning, that it should be shown in green colors on the map as really belonging to Dublin. "Roll up the map of Europe" is a saying that will soon have to give way to "Cut up the map of Ulster."

There has as yet been no reply from German official quarters to the British proposal of a year's suspension of battleship construction. The President of the German Naval League has declared Winston Churchill's offer to be undeserving of serious consideration; but this is the natural position for a president of a navy league to take. In the meanwhile it is to be noted that the German authorities, while fond of speaking of Realpolitik — a policy based on frank recognition of actualities instead of on sentiment or general principles— have in this matter of the limitation of naval armaments not been quite so real as they might be. Mr. Churchill has bluntly stated what everybody knows to be the fact—that Great Britain and Germany are building against each other. The Kaiser's Ministers usually speak of their naval plans as dictated by Germany's Imperial interests and by the necessity of safeguarding the Empire's coasts. Perhaps the Germans have heard that there is such a naval Power as Great Britain, but what conceivable connection can there be between what Great Britain is doing and what the German naval authorities think it right to do? The difficulty with such proposals of friendship as Mr. Churchill has formulated is that, whether they are accepted as a sign of weakness on the part of the British Government or as a sign of condescension, the effect is equally stimulating to hyper-patriotic German sentiment.

The rôle of His Majesty's Opposition in the German governmental system, hitherto played by the Social Democrats, has been definitely assumed by the eldest son of William II. It is not so very long since Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm earned the displeasure of his Imperial father by what was virtually a public demonstration against the Kaiser's Ministers. He was punished by being confined to garrison duty with his regiment, presumably not a heavy punishment for a Hohenzollern and future War Lord. At present the Crown Prince has joined issue with his father's Government on the question of the rights of the Cumberland family in Hanover and Brunswick. The probabilities are that the Kaiser is not excessively outraged by such display of independence on the part of his destined successor. As an adherent of ancient monarchical traditions, the Kaiser must accept it as natural that the heir apparent shall be in opposition to the reigning sovereign, this being about the only kind of opposition that absolutism experiences except in Russia, where assassination is also recognized. At any rate, the Kaiser ought to find satisfaction in a Crown Prince who is intensely, if overzealously, interested in questions of state and policy instead of being wrapped up in the ordinary diversions of princes and youthful kings.

No one believes that the recent heavy loss of life among aeroplane pilots will check the development of heavier-than-air machines, and there must be very few who believe that the misfortunes which have overtaken Zeppelin's air-cruisers will lead to the abandonment of the dirigible. The latest disaster is discouraging, no doubt. But Germany has pinned her faith so closely to Zeppelin that only an unprecedented series of failures can bring total discouragement. Zeppelin's catastrophes are featured in the news. His successes have become commonplace. Aerial navigation in Germany may be divided into three classes. There is the army air fleet, the navy air fleet, and the commercial air craft under private management. Critics have pointed out that it is the naval branch of the service which has suffered most in the way of accident, L-1, which was destroyed in the North Sea some weeks ago, and L-2, which was destroyed last week, both being part of the naval attachment. In civilian aerial ranks the claim is made that the army and navy do not possess a sufficiently expert personnel, though why this should be is difficult to explain. At any rate, such critics point to the fact that Zeppelin tourist ships have been regularly plying the air for a long time without mishap.

The resignation of M. Jules Claretie from the directorship of the Théâtre Français, after a service of twenty-eight years, recalls the man's extraordinary versatility. Born in 1840, he became dramatic critic to the Figaro and Opinion Nationale, newspaper correspondent in the Franco-German war, a staff officer in the National Guard during the Commune, and a voluminous writer on all manner of topics. In 1888 he was elected to the Academy. A glance at his collected works, which were published in 1904, is the best proof of his wide capacity for interest; one would scarcely realize that the stage was his chief concern. And indeed to foreigners he has been known and prized less for his connection with the theatre than for the weekly articles which he has contributed to the Temps and other periodicals. M. Claretie can no more keep his amazing personality from his writings than Dr. Furnivall could make an introduction to a musty text dull. His fund of reminiscence, which involves many sides of life, gives sparkle and reality to whatever he touches. His articles may perhaps be called the sole contemporary representatives of the causerie at its best; they are discursive and yet very much to the point. As director of the Théâtre Français, M. Claretie has kept alive popular interest in the national theatre in a period when competition from without has been steadily growing. His successor is M. Albert Carré, who is well known as the manager of the Opéra Comique.

EX-SENATOR ALDRICH ON THE BANKING BILL.

The speech of ex-Senator Aldrich to the Academy of Political Science, in this city, reviewing and criticising the banking bill now pending in Congress, was an interesting contribution to the discussion. Not only was Mr. Aldrich, between 1908 and 1912, the acknowledged leader in the movement for banking and currency reform, but the pending bill is in very large measure based avowedly on the bill drawn up under his personal supervision. This is the first occasion on which he has publicly discussed the new proposals.

Mr. Aldrich's hostile criticism took wide ground, but he rested it primarily on the assumption that the new note circulation is to be issued by the Government, and on the language of the bill describing the Federal reserve notes as "issued at the discretion of the Federal Board," as designed "for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks," and as constituting "obligations of the United States." Accepting this as a plan for issue of paper money by the Government, he assailed the theory of such governmental powers, reviewing forcibly such well-known arguments in the matter as the experience of revolutionary France, with its assignats, and citing the declarations against Government fiat money by Democratic statesmen and Democratic platforms, up to and since the unhappy Bryan episode of 1896. Bryan, in Mr. Aldrich's view, has in the pending bill, as the price of factional support, won that victory for unsound money which he lost in his personal campaigns for the Presidency.

If this exposition of the nature and character of the bill were correct, then, obviously, other objections to the measure would be wholly superseded by it. There is undoubtedly this much of force in Mr. Aldrich's contention—that the language above referred to, in describing the proposed new currency, is highly mischievous in its implications. It is also true that the language was inserted as a means of placating unsound thinkers of the Bryan stripe, whose opposition might otherwise have blocked the legislation. These facts the Nation has already pointed out as very grave blemishes in the bill. But we have also been at pains to show, what Mr. Aldrich did not recognize in his speech, that the bill's own indirect references to Government paper money are meaningless when tested by its actual provisions for issue of the notes.

Neither directly nor through the national supervisory board is any power over outstanding circulation proposed for the Government, except that the application for new notes, by a given regional reserve bank, may be limited or rejected, and that the tax on such circulation (again misleadingly called the "rate of interest") shall be fixed by the national board. The directors of a regional bank, acting in behalf of individual banks in its district membership, decide when new circulation is required and how much it should be, and through the regional banks that circulation is redeemed when no longer needed. The Government cannot of its own initiative, or through its national board, add a dollar to such circulation, and as for the mere fact of issue of the notes by the Government to the banks, the present National Bank act equally provides that, on the deposit of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States, national banks "shall be entitled to receive from the Controller of the Currency [a Government officer] circulating notes." The Government "issues" the notes, under such conditions, to exactly the extent that it would issue them under the pending bill.

We have gone into this matter in some detail, not because we in any respect approve of the language of the bill regarding the Government's function in these note issues, but because we think Mr. Aldrich has not correctly stated the true purport of the bill in this regard. A similar criticism, in our judgment, runs against his remarks of last week on the Federal Reserve Board. In many respects, his strictures on the powers conferred upon that board are entirely well founded. But his description of those provisions as "an attempt to give a Government board the right to manage a great business" hardly describes the real machinery of the bill.

Supervisory powers of large scope are proposed for this national board, but except for the three powers of "regulating" issue and retirement of the notes (whose actual significance we have already discussed), of suspending reserve requirements in a supposable emergency, and of requiring, in a similar emergency, the rediscount of one regional bank's paper by another, this national board would enjoy no powers of managing or conducting the country's banking business. The process of rediscounting paper for individual institutions is in the hands of the regional bank directorates, two-thirds of whose membership is chosen by the member banks. The rate of discount for such operations is to be fixed each week by the regional bank engaged in them, and not by the Federal Board, which has only the general power of review.

Our readers are aware that the Nation believes even the above-named powers of the national board to be inadequately restricted. Whether by a minority of non-political appointees in that board's membership, or by granting to the proposed Advisory Council of banker appointees a voice in its deliberations, some definite restraining power we hold to be essential. But this is a very different line of objection from one which flatly assumes that the national board is asked to take over the conduct and management of the banking business.

In Mr. Aldrich's comments on what he regards as other serious defects in the proposed machinery, there is much useful and pungent criticism. But the immediately essential duty, in reviewing so important an arraignment of the measure as a whole, is to be sure that no erroneous impression of the measure's actual purport was conveyed.

THE END OF WILLIAM SULZER.

Every thoughtful citizen of New York State must regard it as unfortunate that the judges of the Court of Appeals divided, 5 to 4, and 6 to 3, in the vote declaring Gov. Sulzer guilty on three of the articles of impeachment. But this was a difference of opinion only as concerns his legal guilt. All were agreed as to his moral guilt. Chief Justice Cullen, even while stating his belief that Sulzer ought not to be impeached for acts committed before he became Governor, made it clear that he held him convicted of the utmost moral turpitude. The man made a false oath. Money given him for his political campaign, he took to enrich himself. Judge Cullen did not mince words in declaring that, whatever the Constitutional validity of the charges, Gov. Sulzer had been abundantly proven guilty of the acts alleged. By the strict letter of the law it might not be possible to show that his offences were impeachable, but, even if they were not legally sufficient to oust him from the Governorship, they would oust him from all public respect, would utterly break down his reputation, and would destroy the last vestiges of confidence in him.

This, general moral reprobation of William Sulzer is really the thing that stands out above all the purely legal bearings of his trial. Even if he had been acquitted by a vote or two, he would have remained a Governor at the thought of whom the State could feel only shame and overwhelming mortification. His failure to take the stand in an effort to break the force of the evidence against him would have been regarded as damning. It is stated with positiveness, and the report is credible, that this fact, and especially Sulzer's leaving wholly uncontradicted, or even unchallenged, the testimony of Peek and Morgenthau and Ryan, turned from him several up-State Senators who, in their hostility to Murphy, would have gone all possible lengths in defence of Sulzer. But he himself broke their backs. Hate Murphy as they might, they could not longer stomach Sulzer.

To the conscientiousness and sense of public duty displayed by the Court of Appeals judges who were constrained to vote Sulzer "not guilty"—not guilty, that is, under the Constitution and the Penal Code—all right-thinking men must feel like paying a special tribute. These judges had no illusions about William Sulzer. But the vilest man on earth is entitled to all his rights under the law of the land. And Judges Cullen, Werner, and Bartlett were simply zealous in maintaining what they believed to be the true intent and effect of the Constitutional provisions respecting impeachment, and avoiding the creation of a precedent that might return to plague the commonwealth. The point is highly arguable, and good lawyers and capable judges may differ on the subject, as we see. In the argument before the Court, the opinion of Samuel J. Tilden was more than once quoted—namely, that the Constitution and laws of New York are unlike most others in that they "recognize the principle that a personal crime may create a personal disqualification to exercise the functions of a public office, although the particular offence may be totally disconnected with that office." This is the doctrine which Judge Cullen held to be dangerous, in that it opened the door to serious abuses. Against that peril in the future, now that the precedent has been set in accordance with Mr. Tilden's view, we must hope that the grave utterances and written opinions of the dissenting judges—besides the distinction made by Judge Miller, that Sulzer's offences really "reached into the Governorship"—together with the restraints that public opinion and political decency are able to impose upon reckless politicians, may guard the State.

If the moral and legal results of Gov. Sulzer's impeachment are beyond question, as much cannot be said for its political effects. Concerning these, speculation will doubtless be rife for some time. There has been during the past few days a distinct abatement of the pro-Sulzer feeling. The steady drip of damaging testimony at Albany could not fail to wear it away. But much undoubtedly remains; and how it will influence the election in this city, and political alignments up the State, we can at present only guess. Much will depend on Sulzer's own course. If he at last sallies forth in that deadly war upon Murphy which he has been threatening, if he lays bare the secrets of the Tammany prison-house, the effect may be considerable. But his friends should tell him that vague accusations and general railing will not do. A man publicly discredited as Sulzer now is will have to be very precise and to produce corroboration and documentary or other conclusive evidence before he can be listened to. And the very rumors afloat in Albany about his selling his "story" to a magazine, or preparing to tell it on the lecture platform for pay, imply a general belief in the man's shiftiness which makes dependence upon him like leaning upon a broken reed.

Despite all the reserves one may have about some aspects of the verdict against Sulzer, the final exposure and political disgrace of such a man must be thought of as a wholesome thing in our public life. Those who really knew him, knew that he was absolutely unfit to be Governor of New York. In his disgrace and downfall great political lessons are writ large for all the people. We shall not again lightly delude ourselves into thinking that the gravest faults of personal character and of public record can be condoned or covered up by patter about "the people," as if there were an incantation in the phrase. Nor shall we be disposed to fancy that the espousal of even good causes by an official unworthy of trust, can do anything but weigh them down. Gov. Sulzer is removed from office and his power is broken; but the solemn warning of his career will abide.

GREAT FORTUNES WITHOUT MONOPOLY.

Public interest in the possessions of the late Benjamin Altman has centred chiefly upon the disposition of his extraordinary collection of great masterpieces of painting. But there is another aspect of the great fortune left by this solidly successful merchant which is of wider bearing, and upon which it may be not unprofitable to dwell.

Among the generalities that have flowed trippingly from the tongue of popular economists, now these many years, perhaps none has been more common than the assertion that the large fortunes of our modern days are all derived from monopoly. Without the possession of some law-granted privilege or the ownership of natural resources limited in quantity, it is maintained, nothing more than a modest fortune can be accumulated in a lifetime, except by recourse to those methods of virtual monopolization which, in their most highly developed form, have given rise to the great combinations and consolidations known as Trusts. That monopoly does play a part of the most momentous importance in the economics of our time, we should be the last to deny; but that it has taken anything like full possession of the field is utterly untrue. And the error is of serious practical importance, from more standpoints than one. It bears on the whole question of public policy involved in the Rooseveltian attitude towards monopoly on the one hand and Woodrow Wilson's attitude on the other. It bears on the deeper question underlying this, the question of Socialism. Socialists have for decades been saying that the old forms of opportunity are as good as gone, that it has come down to a choice between monopoly by a handful of individuals on the one hand and monopoly by the Government on the other. And with something like this notion fastened upon their minds, thousands who are not Socialists have fixed their attention on those phenomena that confirm it, and have been blind to those that run counter to it.

Of course, a single instance like that of Mr. Altman, or a half-dozen instances, would be of no significance. But looking at the single instance in the first place, what strikes one is that the two-score millions, more or less, which, from very small beginnings, this merchant acquired were gained simply by the exercise of just such skill, shrewdness, enterprise, tact, as have been the source of business success at all times and in all countries. There was no privilege, and no monopolization of sources of supply; neither was there any manœuvring, or conspiring, or manipulation of prices, to drive competitors out of business. And here we come to the second point. In this success of Mr. Altman's there was nothing singular. Scores of achievements on a similar scale can be pointed to, all over the country. Hundreds, nay thousands, of cases are conspicuous on all hands where fortunes acquired in the past twenty-five years, in absolutely competitive business, by men who began with nothing or next to nothing, while not so great, run up into the millions, or near them. In the very same general line with Mr. Altman, persons still young have seen, in every large city in the country, the rise of gigantic establishments from the most modest start; and of success almost as striking on a more modest scale the evident instances are innumerable. Outside of retail business, the proofs of success do not so readily meet the eye; but the same thing is going on in manufactures, in finance, and in various specialized forms of enterprise. The colossal growth of some of the mail-order houses is proof of what can be done by sheer energy and business ability, without the possession of a single special advantage; and the Woolworth building, the tallest in the world, bears eloquent witness to the possibilities of fortune-building in a line which, at first blush, would seem absurdly unadapted to any such ambition.

Indeed, it has turned out, as is so often the case with confident forecasts of "manifest destiny," that a change whose magnitude, and even whose spectacular suddenness, was undeniable, was nevertheless wanting in that character of finality and completeness which easy-going generalizers ascribed to it. The obsolcteness, or obsolescence, of competition is far less generally assumed as a matter of course in current discussions to-day than it was twenty years ago. When Trust after Trust was forming, when field after field seemed to be closing to competitive enterprise, when method after method of stopping this drift towards monopoly seemed to be proved futile, the conclusion that it was only a matter of a little time before nothing would be left of the older ways of business became all the fashion. It was regarded as a mark of old-fogyism to talk as though the whole matter were not settled; anybody who regarded the competitive régime as a thing worth bothering about was as much out of place in this hustling world as the old man of Dr. Holmes's "Last Leaf." But instead of sweeping everything before it, this notion, some way or other, actually ceased to make head at all, after a few years; and later on, it actually went backwards. People have found their bearings, and see plainly that they took the part for the whole; a big and important part, indeed, but still a small fraction of the great ocean of the economic activities of mankind. Monopoly is seen to be big enough to constitute a great problem; but it is not so big as either to make the solution of the problem hopeless or itself to constitute that solution.

THE WAR AGAINST DISEASE.

One event which marked the virtual completion of our task at Panama received but little attention in the press. On Monday of last week, Col. William C. Gorgas left the Isthmus for New York, accompanied by two of his fellow-workers, of whom one was Dr. S. T. Darling, bacteriologist at Ancon Hospital. It is now a commonplace that the work of Col. Gorgas made the work of Col. Goethals possible. Before Culebra could be conquered, yellow fever and malaria had to be overthrown. The task was accomplished with Col Gorgas as commander-in-chief of the army of sanitation in the field and Dr. Darling as the general staff in the bacteriological laboratory. Their departure from Panama was hastened by the fact that for the good as for the wicked in this world there is no rest. The summons had come from South Africa, where the miners of the Rand, numbering an army of workers greater than that assembled at Panama, have been the victims of the pneumonia scourge and other endemic diseases. The authorities at Johannesburg found it natural to turn for help to Col. Gorgas in his capacity as consulting specialist to sick regions of the earth. Yellow fever has become an "historic disease" at Panama, no endemic case having occurred since 1906. Malarial fever has been reduced from 1,200 cases per thousand of the population in 1906—an average of more than one case for each person—to 81 per thousand in 1912. The attention of the world will now be fixed upon Johannesburg.

The special conditions which will confront Col. Gorgas on the Rand are different from those he has had to deal with in Cuba and Panama. To the layman there can be no similarity between Colón, virtually at sea level, with a maximum summer temperature of 100 degrees and an annual rainfall of 120 inches, and Johannesburg, lying nearly six thousand feet high, with a bracing winter climate and a rainfall of 26 inches. But malaria is no respecter of altitudes. To-day we know that the disease is not due to any mysterious "miasma" rising from moist soils, but is the result of parasitic infection. We have fallen into the habit of speaking of tropical diseases, as if the tropics alone were the home of micro-organisms fatal to human life. But that is simply because the white man is comparatively new to the tropics. It is merely that maladies which the white man encounters in his work of subjecting the new areas of the globe impress themselves on his attention more dramatically than the endemic plagues from which he suffers at home in the temperate zone.

The new bacteriology is thus concerned not only with such tropic and subtropic scourges as cholera, the bubonic plague, yellow fever, and the sleeping sickness, but with those universal ravagers, tuberculosis, pneumonia, typhoid fever, and sexual disease. Tuberculosis kills more people in the United States than any other single cause. Close behind it comes pneumonia. The latest researches in cancer point to a bacterial origin. Unfortunately, in respect to tuberculosis and pneumonia, while the problem of causation has been solved, the remedy has not yet been forthcoming, though, judging by all precedent, the hope of humanity is justified that, once the cause has been ascertained, the remedy is bound to follow in the course of time. What has been accomplished with regard to yellow fever, malarial fever, diphtheria, and sexual disease, and what is on the point of being established with regard to typhoid fever, the not-distant future may see accomplished with respect to tuberculosis, pneumonia, and cancer. The army of research is mobilized in the laboratories of the world. Its work is carried on in comparative obscurity until the dazzling result is given to the world. Compared with this vast labor for the promotion of human happiness, how pitiful seem many of the "social" problems and issues that thunder so loudly in the headlines!

With social progress in its truest and broadest sense the achievements of the new medicine are more than in accord; they are one of the manifestations of that spirit. There is nothing fantastic in the notion that the people of New York or of London may some day be stirred by the idea that the prevalence of tuberculosis is as inimical to the "work" that goes on every day in the factories and offices of New York and London as malaria, yellow fever, and pneumonia are inimical to the work of building a Panama Canal or digging gold from the reefs of the Rand. Then we might call a Gorgas to the task, give him as free a hand as he had at Panama, and see what medical science, even in its present state, can do for the "sanitation" of the East Side or of Shoreditch. The results of such a campaign against tuberculosis, carried on, not as at present, by "education" largely, but as a definite, strategic campaign with military discipline and thoroughness, might show as rich results for humanity as the completion of the Panama Canal.

A RESIDENTIAL GRADUATE COLLEGE.

All the preliminary discussion of the project which yesterday took effect in the dedication of the splendid buildings of the Princeton Graduate College has had for the public, even for the academic public, certain misleading implications. It has seemed that some novel method of instruction, some alteration of standards, must be involved. As a matter of fact the residential Graduate College, as we shall call it for greater clearness, has been intended to provide better living conditions for students who are to work under the standards and approximately with the facilities that have prevailed at Princeton in recent years. It has been and is a question of providing advanced students with dignified housing and table facilities, and with ideal conditions for scholarly companionship.

That this is the purpose—a purpose which should not be too prosaically interpreted—the opening ceremonies make perfectly clear. The four distinguished foreign lecturers were chosen primarily as champions of the residential idea. Professor Shipley, the biologist, and Professor Godley, the classicist, come respectively from Cambridge and Oxford Universities, which have ever held the ideal that scholars of all ages should live in close association with the college. Professor Boutroux, publicist and philosopher, is associated both with the famous Ecole Normale and with the Fondation Thiers, which are alone among institutions of higher liberal studies in France to house their students. The philosopher, Professor Riehl, of the University of Berlin, has been especially interested in effecting the plan for a residential college which was proposed more than a century ago by the patriot philosopher Fichte. Dean West's address emphasized the value of companionship in study, the fruitful interplay of keen young minds, the generally civilizing effect of an Académie which is also a scholar's home.

Clearly, what we have to reckon with is an application to the American graduate student (and to a moiety of his teachers) of the system which has worked admirably in the case of the British undergraduate and most of his teachers. Dean West, to whose unflagging endeavor these stately buildings are an eloquent testimonial, was undoubtedly fired by the charm of college life at Oxford, Cambridge, and the Paris schools, shocked as well by the narrow and sometimes nearly sordid conditions which meet the American graduate student in his lodging and eating-house, distressed by the meagre opportunities which such a life may afford for helpful comradeship. Doubtless there was something more than this in the dream of an Oxford college grafted upon the sturdy Princeton stock. No one will have noted more shrewdly that, besides their services to scholarship, Oxford and Cambridge, centres of what is deemed dilettanteism, homes of odd individualisms, asylums of reaction, have, after all, trained those men of action who in Parliament, in home and colonial administration, in diplomacy, journalism, and literature, guide the destinies and direct the higher thinking of the British Empire. Unquestionably some such ideal of public efficiency also underlies what superficially appears to be the establishment of an uncommonly fine academic club more anglicano.

By this criterion at least the success of the attempt is likely to be judged. If our young specialists can, by rubbing together with one another and with their academic seniors, be made more flexible and available both for their specific work of teaching and research and for various public service, then the Princeton experiment will have fully vindicated itself, and will be followed. Such a success would mean the enriching of our national life all round. No other very concrete advantage or sudden change is to be expected. We are assured that the ideals of teaching and learning and research are to remain at Princeton essentially what they were before, but the new movement has already effected several brilliant new appointments to the faculty. Yet so far as research is concerned, while the residential academic life has its advantages, it also has distinct dangers which at this moment it were ungracious to put forward. Should the Princeton experiment produce no marked scholastic effect, the example of a generous, seemly, and companionable life at Princeton might still attract students, and become matter of envy to universities which cannot afford to Oxfordize their graduate schools. Yet such a success would be provincial and little short of failure. Thus a somewhat heavy responsibility rests upon the young gentlemen and scholars whose windows look across Mr. Cram's picturesque quadrangle to the soaring mass of the Cleveland Memorial Tower. Much has been done for these young men. A miniature letter-true Oxford is put at their disposal through a great architect's unerring taste. If they can combine with the wit and humane scholarship of Oxford something of the robust directness and serviceableness of him whom the soaring tower commemorates, a brilliant academic venture will be justified of its earliest children. Vigeat sub numine.

THE RULE THAT PROVES THE EXCEPTION.

In John Galsworthy's play, "The Pigeon," a London flower-girl who has tried to drown herself is rescued by a policeman and placed under arrest:

> Wellwyn: Well! God in Heaven! Of all the topsy-turvy——! Not a soul in the world wants her alive—and now she's to be prosecuted for trying to be where every one wishes her.

In these few lines Mr. Galsworthy illustrates the attitude and the method of a popular radical school, and sums up also its strength and its weakness. It is the attitude and the method which have Bernard Shaw for their best-known exponent. It is a form of guerrilla warfare against things as they are which consists essentially in rallying the inconsistencies, the contradictions, and the logical gaps in our laws and institutions. For society to drive a poor girl to suicide and for the law to punish her for attempting suicide, proves this to be the kind of topsy-turvy world that lives in Shaw's pages; a world of Liberals who are fanatics, of Conservatives who are anarchists, of virtuous women who despise virtue, of Mrs. Warrens who are pillars of society. The reason why this method should be popular is plain. The method has always been practiced. There is epigrammatic sting to Mr. Galsworthy's lines, there is malice, and there is partial truth: a combination which always scores a decisive debating point.

It is a method that, for all its cleverness, carries with it the impression of a fatal lack of robustness; perhaps because it is too clever. Astounding! Here is a school that denies most things, that questions everything, that demands a clean sweep all round, yet for all that, is dreadfully lacking in red blood. It knocks a head wherever it sees one, but does so with hardly a trace of the moral indignation, the hot wrath with which Cromwell or Robespierre knocked heads and cut them off. It is a quibbling, puckish, Donnybrook spirit. It makes the victim wince, but it does not make him afraid. And it does not make the partisan of established things afraid, because it is fighting for impossibilities. It is fighting for the one great impossibility, which is that there shall be no rules in life, but only exceptions. It does not attack laws, but law; it does not attack definite institutions, but the idea of institutions. It is anti-social; not in the sense that it antagonizes society as at present constituted, but the very idea of social organization. The law which makes attempted suicide a punishable offence may be a bad law. Does Mr. Galsworthy wish us to abolish it? Not in the least. He is aware that if the non-punishment of suicide is made a rule there will be, just the same, unfortunate exceptions who will suffer. He would have no difficulty, for instance, in portraying some weak-willed unfortunate individual who chooses death after a long struggle, in which the existence of a law against suicide might have proved strong enough to act as a deterrent.

In justice to Mr. Galsworthy it must be said that the sentence we have quoted is not altogether typical of his work as a whole. So earnest a student of character and life as Mr. Galsworthy cannot be permanently blind to the inexorable truth that life must be made up of law—and exceptions. But it is quite different with the house of Shaw. There the implication is plain that to live under the rule instead of among the exceptions is ludicrous, indecent, and unjust. Such an attitude offers undoubted opportunities for comedy, for satire, and for the necessary amount of criticism to keep humanity from fossilizing into peaceful self-complaisance. But there it ends. Shaw's bitter little capsules of human inconsistencies and contradictions may help to shake up the liver; they make dreadfully poor nourishment for the normal man.

Long ago the wisdom of the world summed up the situation harshly: the fool can ask more questions than the wise man can answer. This remains true even though the fool is sometimes a Touchstone and the wise man is a dull shepherd in Arden. Heavy-pated Corin in the forest of Arden, who knew that the property of rain is to wet and of fire to burn, and that a great cause of the night is lack of sun, very likely knew that life cannot be turned from rules into exceptions, without making exceptions the rule. Do not imagine that Bernard Shaw, in tearing our social system to pieces, is an anarchist. Under triumphant conditions of anarchy, he would most certainly side with the Archbishop of Canterbury. Mr. Shaw, the critic of existing marriage customs, would not be wanting for material if he were transported to some remote island where, let us say, sexual promiscuity was made compulsory by law. He would immediately write plays about devoted couples who go to the stake as martyrs to monogamy; a practice which would obtain his hearty commendation because it was not the usual thing.

SCANDINAVIAN BOOKS.

BERGEN, Norway, October 12.

When Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson died three years ago, the last of the four great chieftains of Norwegian literature, of whom the others were Ibsen, Kielland, and Lie, a discussion arose to decide who might now be called Norway's most distinguished living author. Public opinion generally centred on the names of Knut Hamsun and Hans Aanrud, the latter of whom recently celebrated his fiftieth birthday amid great ovations. Aanrud is a very popular author, and his stories of peasant life in the eastern part of the country are marked by simplicity, truthfulness, and a keen sense of humor. One of his best stories, delightfully portraying the simple round of a small peasant girl's life, was translated into English a few years ago under the title of "Lisbeth Longfrock," but its literary pendant, "Sølve Solfeng," which pictures a little peasant boy, has not been so honored. As a part of the semi-centennial celebrations over the author, the Gyldendalske publishing house is bringing out a popular edition of his works.

A small volume of lectures, called "Tidsspørsmaal i skole og opdragelse" ("Questions of the Hour in School and Education"), by the professor of pedagogics at the University of Christiania, Otto Anderssen, is concerned with problems of considerable interest. The first three lectures discuss the experiments made to explore the psychological life of the child (pedology), the attempts to furnish young men and women with a higher professional education (the German labor-schools), and the question whether or not ethics should be taught in school. By far the most interesting lecture is the fourth and last, in which the author gives his personal view of the pedagogical tendencies of our time and maintains with much strength that the pupils should have a larger share in directing the school's discipline. It will surprise some readers to learn that Dr. Anderssen takes a somewhat skeptical view of certain modern tendencies in American education, such as the George Junior Republic.

The centenary of the birth of Ivar Aasen, the Norwegian linguist and author, gave rise to the publication of two volumes on his life and work. The more important of the two consists of contributions from Arne Garborg, Anders Hovden, and Halvdan Koht, the last of whom has written an excellent essay containing much new material. The other volume is issued by the periodical, Syn og segn, and is made up of shorter essays and studies, considering mainly the more particular phases of the author's work. Both publications are written exclusively by men who adhere to the new national language of Norway, the "landsmaal," of which Ivar Aasen was the founder, and in this same language the text is written.

A subscription work which should particularly interest Norwegian-Americans, Knut Takla's "Det norske folk i de forenede stater" ("The Norwegian People in the United States"), has just been brought to completion; it covers almost 500 pages, and the price is only four kroner. The book describes the daily life and the economic and cultural conditions of Norwegians in America, and considers at some length the chances of success which a Norwegian immigrant may have in the new country. The author was for twenty-two years a travelling agent for the Skandinaven, a Norwegian daily paper published in Chicago, and naturally has a thorough knowledge of his subject. Once in a while it seems as if his desire to dissuade his countrymen from leaving the Fatherland caused him to draw a gloomy picture; but on the whole it must be said that the work is fairly accurate.

A clergyman of the Danish church, Arboe Rasmussen, has for some time been the centre of a bitter religious controversy in Denmark. He has openly confessed that in many respects he differs with the accepted dogmas of the state church, and when recently he applied for a new appointment in this church his opponents commenced an agitation to have him shut out. Arboe Rasmussen answered by publishing a small book, "Om trosbel endelsen og præstelöftet" ("On the Confession and the Ordination Vow"), in which he maintains his opinions with much clearness and composure, even where the chapters are of a strictly polemical nature, and which abundantly testifies to the author's sincerity as well as to his unflinching belief in the nucleus of the Christian faith. The book is divided into three parts, treating of the confession, the ordination vow, and the immaculate conception, his thoughts on the last matter being somewhat radical.

One of the wittiest Danish writers of the present time, Gustav Wied, has a new book out which lives up to his reputation for boldness and even impropriety. Other recent Danish books which deserve mention are Fr. Moth's "Vagantviserne," J. Paludan's "Fransk-engelsk indflydelse paa Danmarks digtning i Holbergs tidsalder" ("French-English Influence on Danish Literature in the Age of Holberg"), La Cour's "Zacharias Topelius og Fredrik Barfod," and Karl Christensen's "Hvor fremtiden gror" ("Where the Future Grows"), all of which are concerned with subjects from the history of literature and are too valuable to be overlooked.

The eminent Swedish musical critic, W. Peterson-Berger, has issued in book form the seven lectures which he delivered at Stockholm during the winter of 1912-13 on the occasion of the Wagner centenary. The collection, which bears the title "Richard Wagner som kulturföreteelse" ("Richard Wagner as a Cultural Phenomenon"), gives evidence of the author's mastery of his subject and fires the reader with some of his own love and admiration for the great musician. Wagner's position in the history of music is considered in detail. In the last of the lectures, on "Sweden and the Wagner Movement," a little-known subject receives an illuminating treatment. A new subscription work is "Sveriges städer" ("The Cities of Sweden"), the first part of which has been issued by the publishing firm of P. A. Norstedt & Sons, Stockholm. Written by competent authors, it gives a thorough historical description of all Swedish cities and is richly illustrated and admirably executed by the printer's and bookmaker's hands. Twelve parts are to appear each year and the price of the whole work will be 255 kroner, if all parts are ordered together.

The Swedish story-writer, Hjalmar Bergman, recently brought out a new book, called "Loewen historier" ("Loewen Stories"). It contains three stories which are all characterized by the author's customary good humor. Other Swedish books of recent issue are the following: "De löjliga familjarna" ("The Peculiar Families"), by Harald Wägner; "Hans hustrus förflutna" ("His Wife's Past"), by Anders Eje; "Bilder ur Värmlands folkliv" ("Pictures from Life in Värmland"); short stories by J. C. v. Holsten, and "Vårt folk och kristendomen" ("Our People and Christianity"), a series of articles by prominent men.

ARNE KILDAL.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

In an essay entitled "Was Poe Accurate?" Prof. A. H. Tolman says:

> Probably most persons would think of "The Gold Bug" as the best illustration of the accurate working of Poe's mind. The celebrated cryptograph there found solves itself all right, I presume. There are some mathematical statements in this story, however, which are impossible. ("Hamlet and Other Essays," p. 399.)

His presumption, however, with regard to the cryptograph is not entirely warranted, for this, too, contains some mathematical statements which are impossible.

"The Gold Bug" was first published in the Dollar Newspaper (Philadelphia) for June 21 and 28, 1843, where it won a prize of one hundred dollars. Poe had sold the story to Graham for fifty-two dollars, but before its publication had asked Graham to return it to him. "I had returned him the story of 'The Gold Bug' at his own request, as he found that he could dispose of it very advantageously elsewhere" (Graham's Magazine, March, 1850). Copies of the Dollar Newspaper are no longer accessible, but the story was fortunately reprinted in the Philadelphia Saturday Courier, June 24, July 1 and 8, 1843, copies of which are owned by the Pennsylvania Historical Society of Philadelphia.* It was later included in the 1845 edition of Poe's works.

When Poe first wrote the cryptograph, he made the angle at which the telescope was to be elevated "forty-one degrees and thirteen minutes." But in the manuscript corrections which he made in the Lorimer Graham copy, doubtless realizing that his angle of elevation was a bit high, he changed the "forty-one" to "twenty-one" and made the necessary changes in the order of the characters in the cryptograph, adding the] to represent the letter w. However, he neglected to make the corresponding changes in the table of the characters in the cryptograph, but, save for the addition of the] to represent w, let it remain as it was when the cryptograph contained the word "forty-one." The change of degree involved the addition of the letters t w e n to the cryptograph and the subtraction of the letters f o r from it. He should therefore have so changed the numbers which represented the number of times these letters occurred as to make them read as follows:

Of the character	8	[e]	there are	34
" "	;	[t]	"	27
" "	‡	[o]	"	15
" "	•	[n]	"	14
" "	1	[f]	"	7

And a corresponding change should be made in all editions based upon the Lorimer Graham text, some of which are those edited by Stedman-Woodberry, Harrison (Virginia ed.), Stewart, Trent, Perry, Newcomer, Gambrill, and the volume in Macmillan's Pocket Classics.

*Campbell, Nation, XCIII, 363.

But there is even another mistake in the table. If the characters in the original cryptograph be counted, it will be found that there are 203 of them. If the characters as enumerated in the table are counted, it will be found that there are but 193 of them. Evidently then, in constructing the table, Poe overlooked some of the characters; an investigation reveals the fact that he neglected to count the character (, which stands for r. This is the more remarkable since mention is made of this character in the text following the table. There are ten of these, and when they are added to the table the number of characters in both cryptograph and table becomes the same. With the exception of Lowell's edition (published by Crowell, n. d.), this mistake is repeated in all editions not based upon the Lorimer Graham text, among which are those of Duyckinck, Griswold, Ingram, Stoddard, Hale, Graves, and the Cameo edition.

Not having included the (in his original table, Poe naturally overlooked it in the Lorimer Graham corrections. It should therefore be added to the table in those editions based on the Lorimer Graham text, but with a change of the ten to nine, since in the change from "forty-one" to "twenty-one" an r was lost.

In the key to the cryptograph there occurs a similar oversight. Poe says:

> To avoid confusion, it is now time that we arrange our key, as far as discovered, in a tabular form. It will stand thus:

5	represents	a	6	represents	i
†	"	d	*	"	n
8	"	e	‡	"	o
3	"	g	(	"	r
4	"	h	;	"	t

We have, therefore, no less than ten of the most important letters represented.

He has neglected to include in the list the character ?, which represents u and which he had already solved.*

In "The Purloined Letter" it will be remembered that Poe represents Dupin and himself as sitting in a dark room smoking, when the Prefect G—— enters. Dupin starts to light the lamp, but forbears when he hears that G—— has brought him a matter requiring reflection, it being his theory that he can think better in the dark. In two instances in the tale Poe seems to have nodded slightly—perhaps the dark was to blame, perhaps it was the Prefect G——.

In the paragraph:

> "Than whom," said Dupin, amid a perfect whirlwind of smoke, "no more sagacious agent could, I suppose, be desired, or even imagined," it is probable that the object of the whirlwind of smoke was to hide the ironical smile upon Dupin's face as he thus openly ridiculed the Prefect. If so, would not the darkness have afforded ample concealment? Again, at the close of his visit, the Prefect produces a memorandum-book and proceeds to read aloud a minute account of the internal, and especially of the external, appearance of the document." If it was dark when he arrived, surely at the time of his departure it must have been too dark for this incident to have taken place!

As I began with a quotation from Professor Tolman's article, I cannot do better than to conclude with a slightly condensed paragraph from the same source.

> But a truce to petty fault-finding! Poe's fame is secure. . . . His was essentially an original mind; he was a literary . . . discoverer, and the world does not often forget its discoverers. Whether we think of the detective story; of the scientific romance; of what we may call "the short story of atmosphere"; of certain fundamental truths in "the philosophy of composition"; of the true theory of English versification, since elaborated by Sidney Lanier; or of Poe's own peculiar type of intensely musical poetry—we can say with substantial truth, that he was—> the first that ever burst
>
> Into that silent sea.

ALFRED ALLAN KERN.

*This mistake seems to have been noticed by Stoddard in 1884, who is followed by Hale, Graves, and the Cameo edition. The remaining texts have the old incorrect reading.

PLATFORM ANARCHY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Possibly a word should be said under the inspiration of your recent remarks on "Platform Anarchy" (Nation, October 16), as exemplified in Massachusetts at the present time. I note your contention concerning a candidate who refuses to be bound by subsequent party resolutions:

> So many Republicans may have been swayed by his personality, or by a portion of his political creed, that he can scarcely claim in his nomination an unqualified endorsement of his whole platform. The provision of the Massachusetts and New Jersey laws, moreover, that when a party chooses its nominee it chooses also delegates who shall express its political faith, recognizes a party solidarity which Mr. Gardner's emphasis of his personal views opposes.

In the current case of Mr. Gardner, however, it is fairly to be contended that his principles as well as himself were endorsed in making the nomination. There was a well-marked line of cleavage between Gardner and Benton, the opposing nominees. Gardner was chosen by a substantial majority, after an exhaustive campaign in which principles necessarily figured. The subsequent party convention, however, made no account of the cardinal points for which the party's nominee had contended, and a casual reading of its platform might lead one to believe that the nominee was Col. Benton rather than Congressman Gardner.

Under those circumstances, is not the "platform anarchy" rather on the part of the convention than on the part of the candidate? True, the delegates composing that convention were chosen by the self-same votes that chose Capt. Gardner as the nominee. As a matter of fact, however, probably not one voter in a thousand devoted the slightest thought to the delegates, or so much as bothered to read their names. They were at the extreme end of the ticket and could be voted for by marking a single cross on the ballot. It is an undoubted fact that they were chosen in the most absolute indifference, whereas the choice for the head of the ticket—personality, principles, and all—was deliberate and well considered. The choice of Gardner against Benton carried with it a tacit instruction to the party to give out a Gardner, rather than a Benton, platform. As for the delegates to the subsequent convention, there was in almost no case any alternative list. One might write in other names if one chose—but probably no one chose. No ballot more superlatively supererogatory than that for Republican delegates under the present Primary law could well be imagined. It meant nothing to the ordinary voter, and to read into the choice a considered permission to erect any sort of platform that the delegates might choose, even against the candidate's known protest, is quite impossible. The platform officially adopted by the convention was not responsive to the public understanding with which that convention was selected.

Of course the whole matter is of little importance in these piping days of interlocking party politics. No attention whatever is likely to be paid to the platform of the Republican or the Democratic party in Massachusetts this year, by any voter in any city or town. There is no burning issue, and even the four pet planks on which Capt. Gardner lays such stress are wholly immaterial to the situation. The Progressive party, with a new creed to formulate, had some excuse for making its platform a prominent feature, but beyond that the conventions might as well have been entirely omitted. They are for the moment mere survivals of a past, somewhat like the caudal vertebræ in man. But if in any case they became important, I think the votes of the public for a contested nomination should control the opinions embodied in the platform, rather than the votes of the public for a wholly unpledged and unnoticed list of party delegates. The former at least implies the possession of an opinion by the voters. The latter is a meaningless pro forma act.

MR. WILLIAM J. PRICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial headed "The Consuls Safeguarded" (Nation, September 18), there appeared the following statement:

> The minor diplomatic offices are now going to the ordinary hack politicians. Why, for instance, should William J. Price, of Danville, Ky., be sent as Minister to Panama? We have been unable to ascertain that he has had previous diplomatic service, or been anything else at home but a "prominent" local officeholder of mediocre abilities; and the same is true of others recently selected.

Such a grave injustice has been done by the false impressions of Mr. Price drawn by the author of the above-quoted statement, that I feel it my duty as his lifelong friend to place before you the true facts.

Mr. Price, instead of being a "hack" politician, represents the very best type of men in politics to-day, standing among those who advocate clean and good government and the highest standards in public service. At the very outset of life he won high academic honors and bore the reputation among his fellows as being a pure-minded, serious young man, with a regnant purpose in life. After a course at law, he took up the practice of his chosen profession. His ability as a lawyer soon received recognition, which resulted in his election by the Central University of Kentucky to an important chair in its College of Law, where for seven years he did most faithful and efficient work. Later he was elected Prosecuting Attorney for his home district, serving in this capacity for two terms to the satisfaction of the people of his district, and with great credit to himself. Although Mr. Price's home is located in one of the closest political districts in his State, no opposition for nomination or election has been offered against him in any of the political races which he has made.

In order that you may know how well he is esteemed at home, I will state that at a banquet given in his honor just before his departure for his new post, the very highest tributes were paid to him by the president of his alma mater, members of the bar, leading divines of his city, officials, and citizens. IS "HOOSIER POETRY" APPROPRIATE IN THE "NATION"?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A week ago two leading Boston journals printed some verses for children by a North Dakota writer. Most of the words were intentionally misspelled with the evident intention of indicating mispronunciation. The approving comments were unexpected and depressing. Still more so is the general tenor of your editorial, "The Hoosier Poet," in the issue of this week. Doubtless there are many persons who tolerate or even enjoy such barbaric puerilities, but surely few of them are among the regular readers of the Nation. As one of the latter since its foundation, I protest against such misuse of its pages. It may be proper to chronicle the events enumerated in your article as items in the literary history of the United States, but half a dozen lines would have served as specimens of the dialect that needs no example or precept among our young people. To paraphrase Disraeli's epigram as to Gladstone, the existence of such corruptions of English is merely a misfortune; their reproduction in the Nation is a calamity. BURT G. WILDER.

THE SOCIETY OF JESUS.

A Candid History of the Jesuits. By Joseph McCabe. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50 net.

The word "candid" in the title of Mr. McCabe's book immediately catches the attention, both because of its implications and its claim. It implies a criticism of previous attempts to write the history of this Society and puts forward a claim of impartiality for this new effort to perform the same task. As to the failure of M. Cretineau-Joly, chief apologist of the Society, Mr. McCabe's evidence leaves us in little doubt; his glossings over, his omissions, his use of forged documents as genuine, all condemn his work not only as far from "candid," but as misleading and untrustworthy. Nor do those hostile critics, Catholic and Protestant, who have attempted to write the history of the Society, apparently leave us in a much better situation. For while their accounts are true as far as they go, they give but a one-sided view. They tend to paint all Jesuits one color, and that a black of the deepest dye. As to Mr. McCabe's own attempt, a careful reading of it leaves the impression that it is not only a piece of genuine historical work, therefore necessarily "candid," but also one of an excellent order judged by criterions of research, judgment, and narrative skill. Indeed, his previous works, "The Life of St. Augustine," "The Decay of the Catholic Church," and so on, together with his training at Louvain, would amply justify an expectation of a thorough piece of work. Nor does it need his assurance that he is an adherent neither of the Protestant nor of the Catholic faith to inspire us with confidence in his frankness and impartiality.

Yet, candor admitted, has Mr. McCabe after all given us a satisfactory understanding of the most fundamental source of the original strength and continued vitality of the Jesuits? Does he sufficiently emphasize the mysticism and the religious fanaticism that determined Ignatius to dedicate his abilities to the service of the Church, and that continued through all periods to supply the Society with a nucleus of high-minded, genuinely religious, if fanatical, members? A failure to place entirely in the right perspective this dynamic element in the life of the Society is the chief, perhaps the only, serious criticism that can be brought against this judicious and, in parts, intensely absorbing narrative.

No less religious than St. Francis, Ignatius was in other respects a wholly different type. To this difference his training contributed its quota. Ignatius was a military man, trained to value organization and discipline. Yet deeper was his fundamentally diplomatic cast of mind. A consecrated diplomatist, he inoculated his first followers, and through them successive generations, with principles and methods of action that brought success, to be sure, and performed wonders for Catholicism against Protestantism, as well as heroic and spectacular deeds in Europe and on the mission fields, but also brought on the hatred of Protestants, and, strikingly enough, that of a large proportion of the Catholic world as well.

It was Ignatius who first set the example of maintaining against the express commands of the Pope practices that in his own private judgment were best for the Society. It was Ignatius who, by such action, and by seeking privileges that allowed the Jesuits to encroach on the spheres of action of the secular clergy and the other monastic bodies, sowed the seeds of that intense corporate feeling which blossomed into a corporate selfishness; this, perhaps more than anything else, won for them inside the Church itself a cordial hatred. Again it was Ignatius who inculcated that policy of cultivating the wealthy and powerful for the greater glory of God, which proved later so misleading a beacon to the feet of his less inspired followers. Above all, it was Ignatius who first displayed those diplomatic methods of action, that casuistic habit of mind, which in their development inspired the members of the Society with the idea that the end justified the means.

Among the fruits of their selfishness was the hate of the old monastic orders. On the plea that the older orders had forfeited their rights through sloth, inefficiency, and degeneracy, the Jesuits laid claim to much of the secularized church property which had been recovered from Protestant hands after the successes of the Counter Reformation. Just as this plea may have been in many cases, it was not calculated to increase the popularity of the Jesuits. The same was true of their steady and subterranean efforts to obtain control of the established universities. They respected no privileges, were eager to control everything, and, to procure leadership in the Catholic ranks, stopped at nothing. Not only did they assiduously cultivate the friendship of wealthy and influential men and women, but they engaged in commercial undertakings on a large scale. They allowed able merchants, after joining the Society, to conceal their membership and continue in business. In South America their native converts, to the number of three hundred thousand, were gathered in well-ordered villages, and led out to labor in the fields or fight in the armies of the Society. These services the natives performed without other pay than that of lodging, clothing, and food. The profits were gathered in by the Jesuits, and though the Fathers declared these to be inconsiderable or non-existent, the extreme solicitude with which they guarded their "reductions," as the villages were called, from all impartial investigation, suggests the contrary. In one apparently well authenticated case they offered Bishop Cardenas of Paraguay twenty thousand crowns if he would omit their possessions from his diocesan inspection. When this was refused, they spread the report among the natives that Spanish priests were coming who would interfere with the women; they raised a troop of eight hundred natives, advanced on the Episcopal town, procured the coöperation of its Governor by a bribe of thirty thousand crowns, seized, maltreated, and exiled the Bishop, and finally obtained his transference to another diocese. In this way, too, were the Jesuits sowing the whirlwind.

The author furnishes a list of acts, gathered in part from Pascal's biting essays, which were justified by the casuistry of Jesuit confessors. If a man could not sleep without supper, he was not bound to fast. A wife was excused from fasting if her husband thought it interfered with her attractiveness. Wealthy Christians were bound to give to the poor out of their superfluous goods, yet the Jesuit Vasquez proved that "You will scarcely find such a thing as superfluous goods among seculars, even in the case of kings." If a valet found it inconvenient to change his master, he might even hold the ladder by which his master climbed to an illicit adventure, though in this extreme case the master must scold much before the valet would be justified. It was lawful to pursue and kill a man who had dealt you a blow, provided you had merely a technical regard for your honor, and did not feel vindictive. It was lawful for a monk to kill a man who defamed his monastery or his order, if there was no other way to arrest the defamation.

The crash came in 1773, after the Jesuits had been expelled by the Catholic powers of Portugal in 1759, of France in 1764, of Spain and of Naples in 1767. The Pope, Clement XIV, suppressed and abolished the Society "forever," recognizing that it could no longer "produce the abundant fruits and the considerable advantages for which it was created." At the time of its abolition the Society numbered 22,589 members, of whom 11,293 were priests, and owned 669 colleges and 869 other residences. But the Society of Jesus was only scotched, not killed, and its former members seem never to have disappeared from Western Europe. Under Frederick the Great they founded asylums in Prussia, notably Catholic Silesia, which was acquired not many years before from Austria, and also in Russia. In the latter country they maintained their organization intact until restored to a legal life by the action of Pius VII in 1814, who saw in them the most effective agency for rooting out what remained of liberalism and revolution. Since then the Society has suffered many vicissitudes. At present it is still excluded from Portugal, Italy, the German Empire, France, Mexico, and several of the South American republics. It has been restored and is flourishing in Spain, Austria, Belgium, England, and the United States.

With regard to Spain Mr. McCabe says: "I am informed that the present Queen has surrendered entirely to the pressure of the Queen-Mother and the Jesuits. Unless the King has the courage to lighten the laboring vessel of royalty by sacrificing the Jesuits, which would give him immense popularity, Spain will, within ten years, follow the example of Portugal." In Italy, also, growing liberalism, according to Mr. McCabe, will force the Government to return to its strict law which has been much in abeyance. As a result of this leniency, there are large numbers of Jesuits in the country, the Italian province numbering more than a thousand members. "At Rome they control the Gregorian University, the German and Latin Colleges, the Biblical Institute, and other papal establishments. They have recovered all their influence at the Vatican under the present mediæval pontiff, and they are among the most ardent supporters of the reactionary policy with which he is paralyzing higher culture in the Church of Rome. The higher secular clergy are little less anxious than the Socialists and Free Masons to see them suppressed." Yet, with all their vicissitudes, the Jesuits have increased enormously during the last half-century. The future seems brightest for the Jesuits in the Protestant countries. "Probably the Jesuits will, in twenty years' time, be excluded from every Catholic kingdom, yet number more than 20,000."

It is interesting to note that in Mr. McCabe's judgment the Society is still unchanged in its essential characteristics, while the Jesuits of Germany, England, and the United States are a very different body from the Jesuits of Spain,

> There is no change in the inner principles and ideals. "All for the Glory of the Society," as Mgr. Talbot sardonically translated their Latin motto, is still the ruling principle; the Society remains the Esau of the Roman clerical world. It still chiefly seeks the wealthy and powerful; it is the arch-enemy of progress and liberalism in Catholic theology; its scholarship is singularly undistinguished in proportion to its resources; it embarks upon political intrigue, even for the destruction of state forms, whenever its interest seems to require; it is hated by a very large proportion of the Catholic clergy and laity in every country. . . . It is not impossible that Catholicism itself will again angrily suppress the perverse and irregular construction of the Spanish soldier-diplomatist, and insist that religious ideals shall be pursued only by scrupulously clean and unselfish exertions.

CURRENT FICTION.

Westways: A Village Chronicle. By S. Weir Mitchell. New York: The Century Co.

This story is quite up to the standard of Dr. Mitchell's earlier work. Like "Hugh Wynne," it is, in a secondary sense, an historical romance. Most of the action takes place in the later years of the Civil War, and the importance of the war theme throughout quite removes the narrative from the plane of a mere "village chronicle." To the estate and village of "Westways," however, in middle Pennsylvania, the leading figures belong: there we find them, and there we leave them.

The Squire, Capt. James Penhallow, has retired from the service on inheriting the family estates. His wife is a Maryland woman, of slave-holding stock. They are childless, but upon them devolves the care of a niece of the wife, and later of a nephew of the husband. The not over-shrewd novel-reader will discern that Leila Grey and John Penhallow are destined for each other, before a dozen pages of the story are turned. When John, a coddled product of European rearing, arrives at Westways, he is "a thin, pallid, undersized boy, who dislikes even the mild sports of French lads." He carries a gold-mounted cane, speaks with stilted precision, and is afraid of wet feet. Leila, a true American-bred tomboy, takes him in hand, and, with the Squire's assistance, makes a man of him. She herself, of course, presently changes from tomboy to lovely woman, and keeps the hero at arms' length until the final curtain.

Historical figures are introduced with caution. Lincoln makes a single brief appearance in a "speaking part," Grant, Stanton, and others cross the stage, or loom in the wings. The battle-scenes are few, and not the less effective because less "vivid," less ghastly and nightmarish than the current fashion of description. The atmosphere of the time, which Dr. Mitchell remembers for himself, is conveyed as the fancy of the younger generation of fiction-writers, with all their cleverness, can hardly hope to convey it.

The Spotted Panther. By James Francis Dwyer. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.

The Insidious Dr. Fu-Manchu. By Sax Rohmer. New York: McBride, Nast & Co.

The barbaric heroine plot is a very old one; at least as old as the myths of Ariadne and Medea. Its outline is simple: the heroine of foreign race falls in love with the adventurer at first sight, by treason to her friends helps him to accomplish great tasks and avoid fearsome dangers, and at last escapes with the hero. It is interesting to see how closely two recent stories, belonging in other respects to different types, conform to this scheme.

"The Spotted Panther" is a story of adventure in Borneo, written in rather facile journalistic style. If George Fitch should attempt to write in his usual manner a Rider Haggard romance, the result would be something like Mr. Dwyer's story. Chico Morgan and Lord Edwin Templeton, both men of great stature and prowess, set out with the narrator for the interior of Borneo, in search of the Great Parong of Buddha, a huge sword set with priceless gems, which formerly belonged to various conquerors of India. It is now worshipped as a fetich by an inland tribe of head-hunters, of whom the Spotted Panther, a ferocious giant, is chief. Certain descendants of a crew of shipwrecked Portuguese are now recognized as members of the tribe. One of these, Nao, a girl of marvellous beauty, falls in love with Morgan at sight; and through her aid the adventurers escape numerous direful fates, and at last obtain the Great Parong. Of course, Nao escapes with her lover and the rest, but to save her life and destroy the Spotted Panther the Great Parong has to be sacrificed.

"The Insidious Dr. Fu-Manchu" is in some respects a conventional detective story. Nayland Smith, the hero, has for friend and assistant a competent but not too astute medical man. Dr. Petrie is ever at his elbow to administer timely opiates and restoratives to his captives, to admire his acumen and nerve, and endlessly to describe his manner of smoking. The barbarous enemy is Dr. Fu-Manchu, the advance agent of the Yellow Peril, who has brought wealth, universal learning, and all but supernatural resourcefulness to the fine art of murder. Dr. Fu's mission in England is to get rid of men whose knowledge and influence are likely to hinder the development of China as a great military Power. Fu has "a forehead like Shakespeare's and a face like Satan's." In his service are Karamanèh, an Arab slave-girl of supreme beauty, and various highly trained Oriental criminals—dacoits and thugs. Against this combination Nayland Smith would have had small chance; but observe the advantage to a detective of having a presentable medical friend. No Medea could fall in love with Smith—his manners are too much subdued to the trade he works in. He has an unpleasant habit of clicking his teeth, and instead of saying anything, he almost always "snaps," "raps," or "jerks" it. But Karamanèh falls in love with Dr. Petrie at first sight, rescues him and Smith from various horrible deaths, and shoots at least one dacoit to save their lives. Among the many victims of violence in these chronicles we may mention the rules of English grammar.

Myles Calthorpe, I.D.B. By F. E. Mills Young. New York: John Lane Co.

I.D.B. stands for a South African degree of sinister standing—illicit diamond buyer. However, this is not a tale with a crook for a hero. Myles Calthorpe is the old-fashioned young gentleman who sacrifices himself for the woman he loves. As of old, the sacrifice is a mistaken one. Her brother is the real criminal; Calthorpe makes his mistake in fancying that her happiness is bound up in her brother's fate, rather than in his own. Three years of penal servitude leave him still obstinate in his self-immolation. He is persuaded to take another name, and has made a place for himself in a new community, when the girl turns up and exposes him as an ex-convict. In the end the brother confesses, and the pair are brought together, despite a queer element of anti-climax which is injected into the story at the last moment, and which would seem likely to spoil the romance outright for readers of a certain sex. It is unsafe to graft a sprout of realism on purely sentimental stock; and the casual nature of the experiment fatally slackens the grip of the main narrative upon the not too keen sympathies of the reader.

FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Financial History of Ohio. By Ernest Ludlow Bogart, Ph.D. University of Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences. Vol. I, Nos. 1 and 2.

This work is the first issue of the new series inaugurated by the University of Illinois entitled "Studies in the Social Sciences." Hitherto the University has been contented to publish its scientific products of all descriptions, agricultural, mathematical, etc., in the "University Studies"; but with the increase in the number of its faculty and graduate students in those departments dealing with social life, there has been felt, as at other institutions, the need of a special outlet for the results of research along these lines. It is to be hoped that the editors will demand a high standard of scholarship from the contributors, and not feel obliged, as seems to be too frequently common in similar series, to print every study offered because it is a product of the University, or else is recommended by some colleague whose feelings might be hurt, should a product of his seminar be rejected.

This first number, or rather double number, as it is called without any obvious reason, is an excellent example of what can be done in the field of Western history, if the student will only go to the source material and will not base his facts on the traditions preserved in State and county histories. The list of publications principally used by the author shows that he has had recourse only to the most authoritative sources, namely, the Government publications, although he has found these frequently ill-digested and their information scattered and difficult to understand.

The subject of the volume is treated under two headings: the first deals with the "Financial Legislation and Administration," and the second with the "History of Taxation in Ohio." After the preliminary historical sketch in the first chapter comes the study of the budget, which both historians and economists will probably find the most valuable in the volume. The period of territorial and early State finance was marked by thrift and economy in the government:

> The farmers and pioneers who composed the early Legislatures were poor and hard working, unaccustomed to handle large sums of money or to think in large sums, and they ordered the household of the State frugally, as they did their own affairs. The time, moreover, had not yet come for joint effort through State action. Such concerted action as occurred was carried on through the local governments, as road and bridge building, but in general the period and the environment developed individualism rather than coöperation through political agencies.

Beginning with 1825 there was initiated in Ohio a period of internal improvements. The old system of a land tax was changed at this time to that of the general property tax. Although there is no evidence of startling dishonesty in the handling of the funds used in building the first canals, etc., the money easily obtained by borrowing was carelessly spent. From the year 1845 for about a decade there was an era of "legislative extravagance, of administrative dishonesty, and of private and corporate corruption which happily is unique in the history of the State." Under Gov. Chase there came a thorough housecleaning, and at the time of the outbreak of the war between the States, Ohio was prepared to bear the additional expenses incident to that struggle. After the war, the budget of the State rose very rapidly, and there have been periods of great extravaganee and some dishonesty. Particularly in the planning of the State institutions for the dependents and the criminals, the lack of definite plans and of adjustment of the budget brought about great waste. With the panic of 1873 was ushered in a period of economy which was soon broken by renewed improvidence. After 1895 the revenue was increased by a number of new lucrative taxes, and there has been developed a better system of control, but the State still suffers from the hand-to-mouth policy of an elective Legislature and Executive. This chapter is followed by valuable tables in which the receipts and expenditures are grouped in a logical manner. Some such system for financial reports as is here given by Professor Bogart might well be adopted by the officers of our States, whose reports are invariably without classification or analysis.

In the history and analysis of the general property tax, chapter iv, the author traces the growth and final break-down of that system. It was introduced into Ohio in 1825 to replace the complicated and cumbersome system of separate tax laws, that had resulted in many inequalities. The new law "abolished the old system of land classification and at the same time introduced a number of new features: the taxation of all property for State purposes, instead of land alone; the valuation of real property at its true value in money; the specific enumeration of all the forms of property to be taxed; the establishment of boards of equalization, and the other machinery of the general property tax."

This law of 1825 was greatly modified by amendments during the following years, more completely by the Kelley Act in 1846; but in spite of all their efforts, the Legislature was unable to equalize the taxation of land and the less tangible forms of property. Two principles of taxation had become paramount in the minds of the people, when the Constitution of 1851 was drafted and both were incorporated in that instrument. These principles were: the rule of equality in taxation, and the necessity of withdrawing from legislative caprice by including in the Constitution all subjects, such as taxation, in which the selfish interests were opposed to those of the people. In sections 2 and 3 of article xii of the new Constitution all arbitrary taxation was abrogated; but the adoption of the "uniform rule" of taxation developed in a few years into an evil which prevented any further advance towards reform, such as the classification of property; and the laws that have been passed since this time have not marked any material progress over that of 1846. Professor Bogart expresses the hope that the Constitutional Convention, which was sitting while his volume was in the press, would so change the Constitution as to permit the classification of property for purposes of taxation, but this has not happened, for the Convention yielded to the influence of corporate interests and approved the antiquated and discarded system under which the State has suffered for two generations.

In chapters v and vi the author departs somewhat from the limits of his title by including histories of banking and railways in Ohio; but since neither subject has ever received adequate treatment, he was justified in taking the larger view in order that the history of taxation of these important industries might be better understood. There is very much to praise in the volume, for it is well done, and the citizens not only of Ohio but also of other States are in the author's debt.

Autobiography of George Dewey, Admiral of the Navy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50 net.

A trifle under three-fifths of Admiral Dewey's story of his life is taken up with that part of it which preceded his assignment to the command of the Asiatic Squadron; two-fifths is devoted to the momentous twelve months at Manila, and a few pages suffice for the narrative "Since Manila." These are the right proportions. Dewey's career holds much of interest before even he thought of the possibility of our being concerned with the Philippines, though the idea was in his mind long before it had entered that of many of his countrymen.

In 1873, the news of the Virginius affair reached Commander Dewey in the Gulf of California. Going into the wardroom of his vessel, the Narragansett, he found the officers in various attitudes of despondency. In reply to his inquiry, they said that there was to be war with Spain, and, marooned thousands of miles from home, they should be entirely out of it. "On the contrary, we shall be very much in it," he assured them. "If war with Spain is declared, the Narragansett will take Manila." Fate had evidently destined him for the deed which he was to perform a quarter of a century later. But it was necessary for the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to lend fate a hand. In the summer and autumn of 1897, the Navy Department was inclining towards Commodore Howell for the command of the Asiatic Squadron, and political influence also was exerted in his behalf. "I want you to go," Mr. Roosevelt declared to Dewey one day. "You are the man who will be equal to the emergency if one arises. Do you know any Senators?" Dewey had made it a rule never to seek to bring political influence to bear upon the Department. But in answer to this question, he said that Senator Proctor, from his own State of Vermont, was an old friend of the family. "You could not have a better sponsor," Mr. Roosevelt exclaimed. "Lose no time in having him speak a word for you." But the Department had its revenge. Not until after the battle of Manila Bay was Dewey raised to the rank of acting rear-admiral, which for years had been conferred as a matter of course upon every commodore ordered to command the Asiatic Squadron. One of Dewey's friends offered him the consolation that the only one of his predeccssors who had won a great name by action in the Far East also had held his rank. This was Commodore Perry.

When Dewey went to Annapolis as a midshipman, the Academy was only nine years old. The dormitories were merely the barracks which had housed the artillerymen stationed at old Fort Severn. Most of the instructors were civilians. But the course of study was rigorous. Of the sixty who entered with the future admiral in the autumn of 1854, twenty-three fell by the way the first year, and only fifteen received diplomas. At the end of that first year, Dewey ranked twenty-third in a class of thirty-five. The next year, he was ninth in a class of twenty-six; and when he graduated, he stood fifth among fifteen. "There was a saying in the sixties," he writes, "that the men of 1840 in our navy would have been more at home in the ships of Drake's fleet or in those of Spain's invincible armada than in the ironclads of the Civil War." He was to see his first service in the Civil War in an antiquated vessel, the side-wheeler Mississippi, Commodore Perry's flagship when he "opened up" Japan. In 1862, at the age of twenty-four, Dewey became her executive officer. During this period, his youth was continually in his way, men of his rank but of more years being preferred for responsible positions. Nevertheless, the record shows him to have been an officer of nerve and intelligence. His account of the battle of New Orleans reveals Farragut as the indomitable figure which history has painted him. Dewey's narrowest escape was a year or so later, on the Monongahela, when an exploding shell from a field battery mortally wounded a fellow-officer by his side.

One naturally turns with keen interest to the pages in which Vice-Admiral von Diedrichs is mentioned. Dewey does not conceal the anxiety he felt over the presence in Manila Bay of a powerful squadron whose commander seemed determined to ignore the laws and customs usually observed during a blockade. But his displeasure is never suffered to get the upper hand. He is as urbane in recounting the trying experience as he was in undergoing it.

It is an interesting story that Admiral Dewey has to tell, and an important one. He was ready for Manila because, instead of settling down to the routine which contented many officers in the days of our old navy, he was continually observing the naval progress of other nations. The natural interest of the volume is enhanced by its clear, straightforward style, the credit for which is shared by Frederick Palmer.

Changing Russia. By Stephen Graham. With 15 illustrations and a map. New York: John Lane Co. $2.50 net.

Mr. Graham's volume describes a tramp trip along the shore of the Black Sea, from Novorossisk to Batum, and a visit to the gold-mining country of the Urals. Its frontispiece is most appropriately a portrait of the author, from a pencil sketch, rather than a view of any scene in Russia. For as a work on economic and political Russia the book is of small account; as soon as the author reflects he is, not exactly a child, but a half-grown boy prattling childishly. His leading theme is the ugliness of commercialism, now ever encroaching on Russia; the peasant is his idol, the bourgeois his aversion. "The hope lies in the Tsar and his advisers, who are all Conservatives, that they truly conserve and keep the peasantry living simply and sweetly on the land, that they will not make any more commercial concessions when once the present pecuniary needs are satisfied" (p. 11). This anti-commercial enthusiasm leads Mr. Graham to a mildly mystical Slavophilism, probably based on his beloved Dostoievsky. "I believe Russia has an extraordinary greatness to be attained through her Church, through her national institutions, and by virtue of her national landscape. It is a greatness that starts from the peasant soul. . . . The cultivated and educated Russians must not lose their peasant souls" (p. 210). "The Russian Church has the future of the peasantry in its hands more than the Government or the Duma or the Tsar. It can save it from ruthless exploitation by the commercial Western world only by keeping it honest, God-fearing, founded in reality. . . . Happily, as yet there is no need to quarrel with the Tsardom; the need is to combine, to care for the peasant spiritually and materially, by giving him the Church built on the rock, and saving to his hands his own Slavonic land" (p. 162). "Gorky was Russia's last hope. Nothing national has appeared since his day. And until the time when Russia shall say again that England, France, Germany are rotten, empty, and old, until she looks into herself once more, she will fail to have a literature, and will fail to feel herself living as a nation" (p. 126).

These drowsy echoes of futile Russian musings are, however, less prominent in this book than in its predecessor, "Undiscovered Russia." A reader forgives them in his delight over the real charm of the work, its poetic impressions of scenery, incidents, and types of character. One learns of "regiments of yellow hollyhocks and evening primroses, all wild, growing by the way, unaware of their rights to places in gardens, quite unselfconscious, like village maidens who do not know a passing townsman thinks them pretty" (p. 47), and then of the "hares," railway travellers who skilfully avoid paying their fare:

> In Russia . . . a national means of transit . . . is to travel in a train under the seat. To do such a thing in England is scandalous and improper, and the poor hare is liable to be brought to court, rebuked, fined, and then advertised in red print on all the railway stations where his friends wait for trains. In Russia arresting hares would mean arresting half the nation. Hares travel in the third-class compartments; a man or woman under the seat in second- or first-class carriages is comparatively unusual. In the third-class, not only are there hares under the seats, but the same dear furry creatures up in the luggage-rack. The hares are wonderfully tame, and are often lured out of their burrows when the inspector of tickets has gone by, and may be persuaded to take seats, smoke, and give a very lively account of themselves (pp. 237, 238).

The spirit is the same as in "Undiscovered Russia," but the style is more natural and unassuming. At its best the volume recalls—high praise!—Stevenson's "Travels with a Donkey" or his "Inland Voyage." Of informing works on Russia there are many, of artistic narratives very few; among such Mr. Graham's work deserves to hold first place.

Notes

Among the books which the Century Company is publishing this week are "Social Evolution," by Prof. F. Stuart Chapin; "The Near East," being the third volume of travel in the East on which Robert Hichens and Jules Guérin have collaborated, and Arthur Rackham's "Mother Goose," which contains twelve pictures in color by this artist and more than sixty in black and white.

The following titles are soon to be brought out by Revell: "The Keeper of the Vineyard," a novel of the Ozarks, by Mrs. Caroline Abbot Stanley; "The Shepherd of Us All," stories of the Christ, by Mary Stewart, and Prof. Hugh Black's "According to My Gospel."

Included in the autumn list of Browne & Howell, of Chicago, are the following: Francis F. Browne's "The Every-Day Life of Abraham Lincoln," new revised edition; "The Life of Preston B. Plumb, U. S. Senator from Kansas, 1877 to 1891," by William E. Connolley; "Broke: The Man Without the Dime," by Edwin A. Brown, and "Sonnets of a Suffragette," by Berton Braley.

One of the welcome reprints of the season is Mrs. Emily James Putnam's book, "The Lady," which has been brought out in a cheaper edition by Sturgis & Walton.

For the Anniversary Papers by colleagues and pupils of Prof. George Lyman Kittredge, the library of Harvard University has prepared printed catalogue cards covering each of the forty-six contributions. Sets of these cards were distributed free to the subscribers to the Harvard printed cards. A few extra sets can be had by libraries which have bought the book and desire to enter each paper separately in their card catalogues, by sending 60 cents to the librarian of Harvard University, Randall Hall, Cambridge, Mass.

The British-American Peace Centenary is to be celebrated in Great Britain, if the necessary funds can be raised, by the erection of a memorial in Westminster Abbey, the purchase of Sulgrave Manor, the homestead of the Washington family, "as a fruitful symbol of the kinship of the two people," and the foundation of a chair of Anglo-American history, and annual prizes to be given for essays on this subject written by public-school pupils. For the coming celebration in London a special day has been set apart for each State. Bunker Hill day, June 17, has been chosen for Massachusetts, September 4 for New York.

It is evident from his sympathetic introduction that Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason has performed a work of love in editing "Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody" (Houghton Mifflin). The majority of the letters are written to the editor; others are addressed to Robert Morss Lovett, Mrs. Toy, wife of Professor Toy; to Josephine Preston Peabody, Richard Watson Gilder, Percy MacKaye, and Henry Miller, the actor. Whether through the editor's method of selection or because of Moody's constancy to his muse, there is scarcely a letter but touches on the business nearest its author's heart. After undergraduate days at Harvard, during which he supported himself by tutoring, after a year abroad also in the capacity of tutor, and two graduate years at Cambridge, Moody is seen as instructor at the University of Chicago. He chafes under the burden of theme-reading and other "literary drool," though it is said that he performed his labors conscientiously, and constantly looks forward to the respite of vacations when he can devote himself to "It"—the term which he gave to his highest aspirations. Humor saved him from overseriousness. As he writes: "April is only eighty-eight lectures, forty committee meetings, and several thousand themes away"; and, a little later, with a paraphrase of Wordsworth: "My heart leaps up when I behold a calendar on the sly." He is eager, he writes to Mrs. Toy, > for the queer inimitable charm of Cambridge, for that atmosphere of mind at once so impersonal and so warm, for that neatness and decency of you children, who have been washed and dressed and sent to play on the front lawn of time by old auntie Ding-an-sich, while we hoodlums contend with the goat for tomato cans in the alley. I have a fair line of the same to lay before your eyes when I am admitted inside the aristocratic front gate; some of them will make a fine effect in a ring around your geranium bed.

If there was no mawkishness in Moody's attitude towards his life-work, he maintained to the end the high ideal of it with which he started. After he had done all the teaching that he could stand, "he refused the offer, from Chicago University, of the full salary of a professor for lectures during one quarter each year; a single quarter was too much. Of course, the price of such devotion was poverty." And later, when "The Great Divide" had brought him fame, he withstood the temptations of four publishers who offered sums ranging from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars if he would consent to put the play into the form of a novel. "But it had always seemed to him, he said, that the turning of a play into a novel, or vice-versa, was a confounding of two essentially diverse types of art, and therefore a violation of a basic artistic principle, and he refused all the offers." Moody was essentially a poet, even when writing prose. Perhaps no extract from the letters could better illustrate his habitual attitude than the following:

> Yesterday I was skating on a patch of ice in the park, under a poverty-stricken sky flying a pitiful rag of sunset. Some little muckers were guying a slim, raw-boned Irish girl of fifteen, who circled and darted under their banter with complete unconcern. . . . We caught hands in midflight, and skated for an hour, almost alone and quite silent, while the rag of sunset rotted to pieces. I have had few sensations in life that I would exchange for the warmth of her hand through the ragged glove, and the pathetic curve of the half-formed breast where the back of my wrist touched her body. I came away mystically shaken and elate. It is thus the angels converse. She was something absolutely authentic, new, and inexpressible, something which only nature could mix for the heart's intoxication, a compound of ragamuffin, pal, mistress, nun, sister, harlequin, outcast, and bird of God—with something else bafflingly suffused, something ridiculous and frail and savage and tender.

In the introduction Mr. Mason furnishes some interesting instances of the great amount of labor which Moody expended in revising his poetical work.

French appreciation of Meredith was not of tardy development, when we consider the slow progress of his fame among the English. His capricious syntax did not prevent the Revue des Deux Mondes from presenting "Richard Feverel" and "Emilia in England" in the sixties, its translation of the latter bearing the now fixed title of "Sandra Belloni"; he had his critics and admirers before the studies by Schwob and Legras in the nineties; and since his death swarming exegetes have carried off their loads of grist much as across the channel. It is the chief value of Constantin Photiadès's rather missionary "George Meredith" (Scribner) that it summarizes the present state of French interest in the novelist, and tries to analyze his Gallic appeal. The author is frankly national in his point of view. It is as to a brother Celt that he does homage to Meredith, and as products of the fervidly intellectual Celtic temperament that he interprets his books. M. Photiadès's emphasis is upon Meredith's teaching. Indeed, as he does not cloak the fact that Meredith's following must always be small in France, it is interesting that he lays the slenderness of appeal, not to any specifically "foreign" or Anglo-Saxon trait, but to the strain of didactiveness. He emphasizes the pitiless war which the reason of the novelist waged against his fancy, and the satirical or sermonizing undercurrent which is evidenced in his interplay of irony and seriousness—an undercurrent disconcerting alike, in M. Photiadès's opinion, to English, German, and French. For Meredith's style he has little but uncritical praise. The opening of his novels, indeed, he characterizes as German, the incidents complacently insinuated, the sentences prolix, ceremonious, and encrusted with learned allusions; but for the rest the dialogue clinches, the style has a soberness and edge like Voltaire's and a rapid picturesqueness like Mérimée's, yet diversified at times by the effervescence of Michelet and "the passions and transports" of Saint Simon! Happily, in M. Photiadès's account of Meredith's didactic philosophy, he is, if still naive, more critical. It is no elusive interpretation that he attempts; he makes each novel voice directly one or another of the attacks of the Comic Spirit upon multiform egoism, and its chastening of selfish materialism. He quotes a sentence from one of the letters: "Close knowledge of our fellows, discernment of the laws of existence, lead to great civilizations; I have supposed that the novel, exposing and illustrating the natural history of man, may help us to such gifts."

An engaging vignette of the invalid novelist at Flint Cottage in 1908 prefaces M. Photiadès's work. Venerable but energetic, Meredith is heard abusing the press as an invention of the devil perfected in America, praising Tennyson for "making our ugly monosyllabic language sing," recounting the circumstances under which Swinburne, intoxicated with reciting Fitzgerald's "Khayyám" to him, composed "Laus Veneris," and mingling with tirades against the abusive English public much general praise of the French. In these pages, as elsewhere, M. Photiadès evinces his propagandist impulse.

One of the interesting and important things to be done in the study of English literature, taking literature in its larger sense as an exposition of life, is a series of portraits of the great women of the seventeenth century, the women who, like the mother of George Herbert and the wife of Sir William Temple and the patron of Henry More, form the background, so to speak, of the deeper thought and imagination of the age. Rose M. Bradley's "English Housewife in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries" (Longmans) does not proceed from quite so ambitious an intention as this, but it offers an excellent and in itself entertaining preparation for such a study. In a series of chapters, well documented and artfully arranged, she sets forth the home life of the women who managed the larger homes of the age. We see the work of the kitchen and the dining-room and the management of the multifarious employments of the servants. The order is historical and embraces very different conditions of life. But there is no confusion in this. Between the exhibition of the housewife in the seventeenth century and her of the eighteenth there intervenes a chapter dealing with the changes introduced by the influence of Holland, and we feel distinctly the progress of time. Withal the lessons of simplicity and magnanimity are not lost sight of, though they are never intruded harshly. Altogether it is a book to commend, both for its fulness of knowledge and its agreeableness of manner.

Harrison H. Brace's "The Value of Organized Speculation" (Houghton Mifflin) is a calm word of common-sense in an overstrained era. In our eagerness to recast everything in sight, we sometimes forget that existing conditions are almost always the product of deep-seated needs of the past. Strange as it may seem, the function of organized speculation has been to lessen chance. Speculation is a form of insurance against the general risks of business. Among these is the risk of fluctuations in prices due to changing conditions in different periods of time. The seven lean years would doubtless have been leaner but for Joseph's speculation in corn; by steadying the price he reduced human suffering. It is incontestable that the great expansion of organized speculation that followed the Civil War contributed powerfully to the development of our resources. Wall Street, indeed, has conferred benefits which, to a reasonable mind, should cover a multitude of sins. It has applied the power of steam to the sea and built our railways and created our banking institutions. In every instance progress would have been incalculably slower without its aid. The methods by which it has effected these and other important ends are not easily understood by those not in immediate touch with its activities. But though its technique may seem difficult, its commercial philosophy is identical with that of the rest of mankind. Mr. Brace affords us repeated instances of this fact. He shows us, for example, that there is no essential distinction between dealings in real-estate equities and "margin trading" in securities. Antedating the equity is a mortgage, or a "payment" down; antedating the Wall Street speculation is also a payment down, known as a "margin." The only difference is that margin transactions are the more numerous and the margin smaller. The cry against "futures" amounts to an invidious distinction. The propriety of deferred deliveries is not questioned in general business. A builder, for example, agrees to deliver a building within a specified time, though he may have none of the materials, machinery, or labor at hand when the contract is made. The principle is identical with that which governs the trading in futures.

Mr. Brace is, indeed, a courageous man. He makes what many have come to regard as the worse part appear the better part, and he accomplishes this by keen analysis, by the exercise of shrewd common-sense. He is prepared to admit that there are grave evils connected with organized speculation as it exists to-day, but he maintains that the members of our exchanges are not demons, and that their sentiments are as altruistic as any. If we look beyond the present repulsive aspect of speculative exchanges and disregard the noisy, shouting crowd of greedy money-grabbers, the whole process may appear in a different light. That which is repulsive is seen as merely the outward form of an important factor in commerce as yet undeveloped. The exchange idea, in short, is seen as the crowning one in a world of possible economic harmonies.

Samuel P. Orth's "Socialism and Democracy in Europe" (Holt) is not a work for advanced students. Those persons, however, who from want of time or from lack of mental discipline feel impelled to acquire knowledge in predigested form will find this a useful book. One does not here get a glimpse of the profundities and subtleties of the economics of Socialism. We obtain no inkling, for example, of the argument by which Marx attempts to sustain his theory of "Surplus Value," though some space is devoted to a recapitulation of "Capital." We are merely told that, according to Marx, "surplus value" is a species of robbery, with a word to the effect that Menger has completely refuted Marx. Yet if we accept Mr. Orth as an annalist pure and simple, we feel that he is entitled to our gratitude. He has selected his facts with excellent judgment and presented them graphically. The theories of the Utopians, of the doctrinaires of the revolutionary era, which began about 1830, and of the modernists, of whom Karl Marx was the father, are all outlined here. We can see almost at a glance what was desired, even if we are left in ignorance of the mental processes of those who have kept up the warfare for Socialism. The author has his own comments, but they are for the most part confined to summing up the results of a century of agitation, parliamentary debate, and economic transformation. Thus he tells us that the Socialist movement has accomplished three notable things: it has spread democracy, forced the labor question upon the lawmakers, and increased the functions of the state. These are, of course, inevitable conclusions—no one acquainted in the slightest degree with the history of the Socialistic movement could ignore them. Yet despite a certain lack of originality, it would be hard to mention a better fact book of Socialism for busy persons.

"The Freshman and His College" (Heath), by Francis Cummins Lockwood, attempts to supply students entering college with the counsel and direction necessary to prevent waste of time and opportunity during the first year of college. The author confesses frankly that he was himself "a good-for-nothing freshman" and that he "ignorantly and idly wasted" the year. He declares that the reason was his ignorance of the meaning of a college course. The larger part of the volume is composed of essays and addresses by leading educators on the function of higher education and the spirit which should actuate one in the pursuit of it. These include ex-President Eliot's "New Definition of the Cultivated Man," President Jordan's chapter on "Recent Tendencies in College Education," the notable address of the late John Butler Johnson on "Two Kinds of Education for Engineers," portions of the inaugural addresses of Presidents Hibben and Meiklejohn, and Cardinal Newman's classic, "Description of a Gentleman." Professor Lockwood's contributions to the volume include brief sections on "Freshman Difficulties and Dangers," "Devotion to Boyhood Ideals," and "The Good Drudge Habit." As a whole, the book is marked by wholesome frankness and candor, constraining appeal to manly instinct, and good sense stated in a plain, honest fashion. It furnishes in brief compass some of the best recent utterances on college ideals and student temptations. Few college freshmen would be indifferent to its appeals, and its use as a part of the customary course in freshman English might prevent many of the fatalities in our freshman classes, which are so distressing to all thoughtful observers of the tendencies in American colleges. Now that courses in practical ethics are no longer found in our curricula, college authorities owe to their students some such presentation of practical college problems as Professor Lockwood has furnished.

The last thirty years of American and New York politics are reviewed in John L. Heaton's "The Story of a Page" (Harper). The author is an editorial writer on the New York World, and his story is of his newspaper's editorial policy from 1883, when Joseph Pulitzer obtained control. Although Mr. Heaton is inclined to give his paper the main part of the credit for events to which numerous influences contributed, he is fair enough to admit a mistake in attitude now and then. One such was the World's sensational treatment of the Homestead strike, in referenee to which it took a position very much like opposition to law and order. A few cablegrams from Mr. Pulitzer, who was ill in Paris, set it right. The World fell foul of the Government when, in the closing weeks of 1895, it published dispatches from prominent Englishmen deprecating the spirit of war that had been aroused by Cleveland's Venezuelan message. Secretary Olney brandished a statute of 1799 over its head, but did nothing more. The attempt of President Roosevelt to prosecute it for utterances regarding the $40,000,000 paid the French Panama Canal Company for its rights is still fresh in the public mind. The World has long fought for an income and inheritance tax, a tariff for revenue, and the extension of the merit system. The record of its editorial page is one of virile independence, expressed in pungent English.

In "Inscriptions from Swiss Chalets" (Oxford University Press), Walter Larden has found a capital subject for antiquarian investigation. The little volume is novel and delightful reading for the kind of person who favors rustic epitaphs. The mottoes, mainly in verse, have been most painstakingly read with the opera glass, and since the odd lettering, often very beautiful, defies the resources of the modern typographer's case, there are many photographs of the original inscriptions. Apparently the builders, quite as often as the owners, chose the sentiments. The earliest examples go back to the sixteenth century; the eighteenth supplies the great mass of texts. Builders' apologies are common, the following being a stock example from a chalet of 1618:

ES.IST.KEIN.MENTSCH.VF.DISER.WELD.
DER.BVWEN.KAN.DAS.IEDERMAN.GEFELT.
GEFELT.ES.DOCH.NIT.IEDERMAN.
SO.HAN.ICH.DOCH.MIN.BEST.GETAN.

The sentiment that here we have no abiding habitation is often piously expressed, as in this verse from a carpenter's plane dated 1704. Tradition links the Emperor Maximilian's name with this posy.

Ich läb', und wis nit wie lang;
Ich stärb, und wis nit wan;
Ich fare dahin, und wis nit wohin;
Mich wundert, dass ich so fröhlich bin.

Among the many aphoristic verses one of the prettiest is found in a house of 1799 near Kandersteg:

Hier in diessem Wilden Thal,
Wo der Schnee mit Hauffen felt,
Wächset doch das beste Grase
Das man findet von der Welt.

The label "Made in Germany" need not be confined to general merchandise, for Frederic C. Howe, in "European Cities at Work" (Scribner), lets us know that it can with equal propriety be made to refer to the model city. He knows of no cities in the modern world which compare with those which have arisen in the Fatherland during the past twenty years. There is none in Great Britain, he declares; and there is none in France, where there has been little progress in city building since the days of Baron Haussmann. He pictures Cologne, Düsseldorf, and Frankfort in contrast with Cleveland, Detroit, and Pittsburgh, and we hang our head. The German city treats the land on which it is built as an architect treats the site of a structure. It treats it as a unit, with plumbing, circulation, breathing-spots, and centres for the various activities of the community. It dreams of beauty, like the Romans of the age of the Antonines, and the Mediæval cities of Italy, France, Germany, and the Netherlands. Its thought is not merely of line and color, but also of comfort and convenience and the mental and moral upbuilding of its people. Though Great Britain has much to learn from Germany, it still has much to teach America. It is a trifle discouraging to have our attention called to the fact that the European city is far from democratic, that officials consult the voters but little, and that they manage the city in a rather autocratic fashion. That is not our way of doing things. Yet we are not without hope. Mr. Howe concedes that our system of local taxation is more just than that of any other country. Our schools are superior to those of most countries, and are comparable to those of any. Our parks and playgrounds and libraries and fire departments attract the attention of foreigners. And Mr. Howe thinks that we are forming new ideals and developing a city sense. Nevertheless, from his own showing, there remains a distressing amount to be done. One of the best ways to get us about it is to multiply such descriptions as he has given us. If we once acquire the zeal of the German cities, it will not be impossible to acquire the knowledge.

The return of Gen. Castro to Venezuela and the ensuing revolution have necessitated the absence from Caracas of President Gomez, who has felt it advisable to take personal command of the army. This has caused the promotion of the Vice-President, Dr. José Gil Fortoul, to the position of Provisional President of the republic. Dr. Gil Fortoul, who was for many years connected with Venezuelan diplomatic missions in Europe, is one of the ablest and most distinguished authors which any South American republic has produced. The two volumes of his "Historia Constitucional de Venezuela," which were published in Berlin in 1907 and 1909, are remarkable not only for the simplicity of their style, but also for the evidences of the influence of German scholarship on their author. To find a Latin-American author writing the history of his country in a modest and dignified fashion, basing his results on extensive researches instead of vivid imagination is not an every-day occurrence. Previous to the publishing of this important work he had to his credit nearly a dozen volumes of literature and philosophy. His judgments of men are remarkably fair and unprejudiced, possibly another result of his long absence from Venezuela and his freedom from the unfortunate political disputes whose rancor and virulence have left their mark on so many South American minds. Avowedly more fond of fox-hunting than of diplomacy, able to write not only solid constitutional history, but also fanciful literary sketches, interesting travel notes, and thoughtful essays on political philosophy, Dr. Gil Fortoul brings to the important post which he holds as President of the Council of Ministers and Provisional President of Venezuela a personality of unusual charm and power. Venezuela is to be congratulated on her good sense in taking advantage of the services of one of her most distinguished citizens.

We record with regret the death of William Garrott Brown, who died of tuberculosis on Sunday at New Canaan, Conn. He was a man of rare mental quality; he had achieved much, and shown promise of more when disease struck him down. One of the foremost Southern writers on historical topics, he will be deeply mourned. Mr. Brown was born at Marion, Ala., in 1868, graduated from Howard College in 1886, and received from Harvard in 1891 and 1892, respectively, the degrees of A.B. and A.M. From 1893 to 1901 he was assistant librarian at Harvard, and during the following year lectured there on American history. He had been president of the Harvard Democratic Club, in 1896 he joined the sound money movement, and was a member of the State Committee of Massachusetts. In addition to his contributions to the Atlantic Monthly, the Nation, and other periodicals, he was the author of "Official Guide to Harvard University," "A History of Alabama," "Andrew Jackson," "Stephen Arnold Douglas, "The Lower South in American History," "Golf," "A Gentleman of the South," "The Foe of Compromise and Other Essays," and "Life of Oliver Ellsworth." Since 1908 he had been on the editorial staff of Harper's Weekly.

Mrs. Mary Bradford Crowninshield, widow of Rear-Admiral Arent Schuyler Crowninshield, and a writer of fiction, died last week in a private sanitarium in Melrose, Mass., a suburb of Boston. She was a daughter of Judge John Melancthon Bradford and a descendant of Gov. William Bradford of Plymouth Colony. Mrs. Crowninshield's first published book was "Latitude 19°," which met with a considerable success. She also wrote "Where the Trade Wind Blows," "All Among the Lighthouses," "Plucky Squalls," "San Isidro," "The Archbishop and the Lady."

An Illustrated Flora of the Northern United States, Canada, and the British Possessions, from Newfoundland to the Parallel of the Southern Boundary of Virginia, and from the Atlantic Ocean Westward to the 102d Meridian. By Nathaniel L. Britton and Addison Brown. Second edition; revised and enlarged. In three volumes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $13.50 net.

The preparation of any illustrated flora requires great courage. It is sometimes well-nigh impossible to obtain trustworthy representative material for the artists, and even at the hands of skilled artists it is not easy to procure uniformity in the drawings. When the geographical range covered by the flora is very wide, these difficulties become enormously increased. For instance, in the case of the treatise now before us, in which more than four thousand species are illustrated and described for purposes of ready identification, the task which confronted the authors must have seemed appalling. Nevertheless, the authors of the work planned the treatise with good courage on generous lines, both as regards the illustrations and the typographical presentation of the descriptive text. The fact that the volumes have now reached their second edition is proof that the confidence of the authors in the purchasing public was not misplaced.

In the introduction, it is stated that the enterprise was projected by Judge Brown, and maintained and supervised by him throughout. The present revision is understood to have been completed just before his death in April of this year. Judge Brown was for about twenty years Judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York State, and during this term of service is said to have rendered written decisions in more than 2,000 cases. His chief recreative avocation was botany. He was widely conversant with modern methods of classification, and early became desirous of having some one prepare a descriptive flora of the Northern Atlantic States, upon an evolutionary basis. In the person of Professor Britton, of Columbia, he found an energetic enthusiast who was not averse to breaking with tradition, and to him was committed the task of writing the descriptive text and arranging for illustrations. The ample collections of American plants at Columbia, largely brought together by Professor Torrey, supplied much of the needed material, and this was supplemented by the minor collections made by a host of zealous botanists and correspondents. Professor Britton adopted a system of nomenclature which did not meet with general approval, on account of its revolutionary character, and which is not likely to be accepted in many of its details; but the possible confusions resulting therefrom are greatly diminished by an impartial presentation of synonyms. The arduous task was completed in a surprisingly short time. The three volumes of the work were published in 1896 to 1898 in an edition of six thousand which was soon exhausted. A second edition was immediately in course of preparation. About 300 pages have been added, and a careful revision has been given to the whole work.

Judge Brown had long been especially interested in the trivial or common names of plants, and had become a leading authority in regard to them. In the first edition, the results of his labors in this field were brought by him into the form of a comprehensive index which was not particularly convenient for reference. In the present edition, on the other hand, the popular names have been carried into their rightful places in the descriptive text. In many French treatises on botany, the popular names are for the sake of clearness set in greater prominence than the Latin names. The change of place of the popular names in the present edition must be regarded as a great improvement.

In the case of our native plants which have no part in American folklore, it is not always easy to suggest an acceptable name for popular use. In many instances it is necessary to employ the scientific generic name as a popular designation, to which is prefixed some adjective, as salt-meadow diplachne, powdery thalia, Virginia hexastylis, and the like. Of course, in supplying every species with a trivial name, there must be some cases in which a smile is excited by the clumsiness, but, on the whole, this part of an ungracious and difficult study has been ingeniously managed.

Our early American floras were arranged on the Linnæan system of classification. The number and relations of the stamens and pistils were made a basis of order. Such an arrangement is good for ready reference, but except in a few instances it conceals the true affinities of the species. The Linnæan method is so very simple that it is still retained as a subsidiary system in some of the smaller foreign floras. After the Linnæan classification there came into use in our country the so-called Natural System of classification, in which a more or less successful attempt was made to present the affinities of supposedly related species.

The manuals and class-books based on the Natural System were found rather more difficult to use in the recognition of species, than the Linnæan textbooks, and many devices in the form of artificial keys were employed. Here and there a few plates or drawings were introduced as helps, but in those days wood engravings and lithographs were costly, and hence these aids were sparingly used.

For some years before the advent of Darwinism it had become apparent that the Natural System, as it was then presented, did not fully express the existing relationships, and after the leaven of Darwinism had fairly begun to work, it became obvious that extensive modifications would have to be made in the ordinal sequence. In the new systems based on evolution (and there were not a few of them, agreeing in a general way, but with many points of divergence), it was found best to present first the groups which were simplest in structure, and proceed from these simple forms to those which were more complex. Of course, in the study of such a family tree, there is likely to be wide difference of opinion as to certain minor points in the pedigree, and there can be no absolute agreement until all the facts are known in regard to every species. In the present work, the sequence of natural families has been exceedingly well ordered and runs from the lower to the higher in a safe and conservative manner. The whole treatise is valuable for botanists and for amateurs. It is a library work, not designed for field reference, but for consultation after the collector has returned to his home. In general it will lead to easy identification of a vast range of species, more, in fact, than 4,000, and it is applicable to employment over a wide extent of territory. The success of this work must have been a source of deep gratification to the original projector, Judge Addison Brown, and will be an additional stimulus to the surviving author.

The typographical execution of the work leaves absolutely nothing to be desired.

Drama

THE SOCIAL DRAMAS OF GERHART HAUPTMANN.

The Dramatic Works of Gerhart Hauptmann. Edited by Ludwig Lewisohn. Volumes I and II: Social Dramas. New York: B. W. Huebsch. $1.50 net, each.

Gerhart Hauptmann, in spite of the success of his "Sunken Bell," cannot be said as yet to have conquered the English stage. The translation of all his dramatic works, with the exception of "Florian Geyer," which is now under way, is not so much a proof as a test of his international celebrity. The two volumes before us, comprising his social dramas, afford an opportunity for inquiring to what extent the problems with which Hauptmann's muse is chiefly concerned appeal to non-German taste.

The seven plays depict conditions and characters nothing quite analogous to which can be found outside of Hauptmann's fatherland. Like other masters of the naturalistic school, Hauptmann looks into the soul of his fellow-men and sees misery written large. Vice, it is true, is international, but he gives it an eminently German setting. The curse of alcoholism, the penalty of ill-regulated sexual passion, the tyranny of capital, the degradation of pauper labor, the temptations of an ignorant peasantry, the cunning of the criminal classes—these are the themes of which Hauptmann's social dramas treat. Collectively, they illustrate that phase of his literary activity which, in the opinion of his admirers, marks him as the greatest living exponent of realism on the contemporary stage.

It is characteristic of Hauptmann's restless versatility that his intellectual output, viewed in chronological order, shows no progressive development, no well-defined artistic or æsthetic aim, no consistent, philosophical, and ethical tendency. Romanticist to-day, he is realist to-morrow. The lyric beauty of the "Versunkene Glocke" and the touching symbolism of "Hanneles Himmelfahrt" present the greatest possible contrast to the grossness of most of his social dramas. He began as a full-fledged disciple of Tolstoy and Zola in his play, "Vor Sonnenaufgang" ("Before Dawn"), in which, to speak with one of Hauptmann's fervent though not wholly uncritical admirers, Paul Schlenther, "man is approaching the natural state of the beast." In this drama, so Schlenther asserts, Hauptmann did for the lowest strata of the German peasantry what Feuillet, Augier, and Dumas had done for the French salon. And Hebbel, Otto Ludwig, and Anzengruber, according to Schlenther, found a successor in Hauptmann, who, without being influenced by them, understood like them the passions and the speech of the plain people. Another critic, Arno Holz, himself a prominent representative of the naturalistic school, speaks of the play as "the best drama ever written in the German language."

Certainly no other dramatic genius ever burst upon the world with so dismal a tale. One single sympathetic figure emerges from the besotted and bestial population of one of those Silesian villages Hauptmann loves to portray—a pure, strong-willed maiden, whom a weak apostle of temperance and race eugenics for a moment thinks of marrying, but who is left, disillusioned, to commit suicide. German psychologists think it worth while to discuss minutely the scientific verisimilitude of the mental and moral ruin wrought by alcohol in the Krause family. Prof. Wilhelm Weygandt, a noted alienist, places Hauptmann above Ibsen in the accuracy of his description of the curse of inherited dipsomania, although he speaks of the play as one of abject despair, "the like of which is scarcely to be found in the bloodiest tragedies of all literature."

Hauptmann has, fortunately, in some of his later works not fully borne out his early promise. There is genuine dramatic power, deep human sympathy, and much technical skill in "Die Weber" ("The Weavers"), but with all this, his ruthless disclosure of the condition of the wretched Silesian paupers in the forties fails to interest English audiences of a later day. The play has neither hero nor heroine. Whatever moral force may lie in Spielhagen's exclamation: "You look for its hero: I have it! The hero is misery," dramatically the plea is weak. In Germany interest in the play is kept alive by its bearing on the political and social problems of the day.

"Rose Bernd," a drama of far greater artistic merit than either "Vor Sonnenaufgang" or "Die Weber," has met with less success on the German stage. In Vienna it was withdrawn from the Burgtheater after the fifth performance, in the interest of public morality, as interpreted, so it was said, by the highest circles. Yet "Rose Bernd" proclaims no dangerous social gospel, and the immorality of the play, though flagrant, is relieved by a remarkably well-drawn character, that of the wronged wife, who holds out her sympathy and aid to the girl whom her husband has betrayed, and whose end is despair and child-murder. The play has poetic touches, and the plot is ingenious, but its details are revolting to the last degree.

Theatrically, "Fuhrmann Henschel" ("Drayman Henschel") has scored a greater success than any other of Hauptmann's plays. There are few more "taking" rôles than that of the kindly, taciturn dreamer Henschel, who, having violated a promise to his dying wife, is driven by the brutality of her successor and by remorse and fear of ghosts to fury and self-murder. Much has been made by German critics of Hauptmann's observance of the so-called Aristotelian unities in "Fuhrmann Henschel," and the play is unquestionably better constructed than any other of his social dramas, but glorification of Hauptmann as the restorer of the classic fatum to its rightful place on the stage comes with ill grace from those who still speak of Grillparzer as the "Schicksalstragiker."

From a purely æsthetic point of view, Hauptmann's plays in a lighter vein are open to even greater objection than his serious social dramas. Three of his comedies are included in Mr. Lewisohn's two volumes—"Der Biberpelz" ("The Beaver Coat"), its continuation, "Der rote Hahn" ("The Conflagration"), and "Die Ratten" ("The Rats"). The "Biberpelz" has been styled by Hauptmann "eine Diebskomödie"—a comedy of thievery. He might more characteristically have called it "a comedy of German police stupidity," for its only value lies in the delineation—clumsy as it must seem to foreign audiences—of an overbearing police official utterly helpless in the presence of perplexities of the most puerile kind. It is absurd to compare, as has been done, Hauptmann's play with Kleist's "Der zerbrochene Krug." There is neither wit, sprightliness, nor beauty of language in "Der Biberpelz." All is coarse and wooden, and the heroine, an intensely vulgar, petty thief, cannot possibly engross the attention of a foreign audience with sufficient taste to discriminate between what is dramatically permissible and what is forbidden. "Stealing," says Schiller, in his essay on "The Use of the Vulgar and Low in Art" ("Gedanken über den Gebrauch des Gemeinen und Niedrigen in der Kunst"), "is something absolutely low, and whatever our hearts may plead in extenuation of the action of a thief, . . . æsthetically he remains low. . . . A person who steals is a most degrading object for any serious poetic representation."

In "Der rote Hahn" the heroine degenerates from a thief into an incendiary, and with it degenerates the plot of the comedy. Tiresome repetition takes the place of psychological development, and the play is dull and profitless. What there was of humor in the first part becomes stale in the second; the new episodic characters come and go without relation to the plot, and the German public which tolerates the "Biberpelz" for the scope which it gives to good acting—"Mediocre plays," says Lessing, "are always acted best"—refuses to accept "Der rote Hahn" on any terms.

"Die Ratten" is reminiscent of the time when Hauptmann thought of preparing for the stage. Admirers of the play find something to admire in the figure of Hassenreuter, the ranting barnstormer and ex-manager, whose attic is stuffed with theatrical rubbish, both inanimate and living, and about whom group themselves, in confused relation, some of the most abandoned characters which the scum of a large city can furnish. A mother's struggle for the possession of her newly born illegitimate child, adopted by a woman anxious to palm it off as her own, constitutes the tragic element of the story, which, false in its pathos and forced in its humor, utterly fails to give reality to the "realism" of Berlin low life.

It was, indeed, a difficult task which lay before the English translator of these social plays. They were all written in dialect, mainly the Silesian, which is not always easy reading even for Germans, and in all of them great stress is laid on local color and flavor. Conscientious and intelligent as the work of Professor Lewisohn and his collaborator has, on the whole, been (Miss Mary Morison is responsible for the translation of "Die Weber"), the result was bound to be lifeless. No English reader will rise from the perusal of these plays with the consciousness of having been in the presence of a great dramatic genius, or the feeling that he has enjoyed a rare literary treat. Whatever of raciness there is in the original speech of the Silesian weavers would have been inevitably lost in any translation, but Professor Lewisohn at the outset made it impossible for himself to render Hauptmann's idioms into adequate English. He decided, as he tells us, "to invent a dialect near enough to the English of the common people to convince the reader or spectator, yet not so near to the usage of any class or locality as to interpose between him and Hauptmann's characters an Irish or a Cockney, a Southern or a New England, atmosphere."

Now, the invention of a dialect is a dangerous business and beyond the power of any man. It is difficult enough to render accurately in writing any existing dialect of one's mother tongue. Strictly speaking, Mr. Lewisohn has "invented" very little, but he has adopted from the illiterate talk of both Northerners and Southerners (including negroes), and from the current slang of the hour, whatever has seemed to him to be an approximate equivalent of the original.

All such blemishes upon a generally accurate translation appear insignificant in comparison with the lack of critical perspective shown by Mr. Lewisohn in his Introduction to the plays. There we are told that beside the speech of Hauptmann's characters "all other dramatic speech, that of Ibsen, of Tolstoy in 'The Power of Darkness,' or of Pinero, seems conscious and inhuman." What may be considered a defect in other dramatists becomes, in Mr. Lewisohn's eyes, a positive virtue, if applied to Hauptmann. "He shapes his material as little as possible." His fables "are simple and devoid of plot." And "it goes without saying that he rejects the monologue," though one cannot help thinking of Hamlet's "To be, or not to be" and remembers Diderot's question: "Why do certain monologues produce so great an effect?" Hauptmann's character drawing, so Mr. Lewisohn finds, has nothing in common with "the set phrases of Dickens"; he relies on "the high moral expressiveness of common things." And with praise for Hauptmann's negative merits is mingled unbounded admiration for his positive achievements. The blank verse of "Die versunkene Glocke" is "the best in the German drama." The public of the German theatres and some of the sanest critical judgment of Germany may have objected to the dramatization, with revolting details, of Hartmann von Aue's leper-legend of "Der arme Heinrich"; Mr. Lewisohn entertains "little doubt but that this play will ultimately rank as the most satisfying drama of its time."

In the surrender of the critical functions Mr. Lewisohn but reflects the attitude of many of the German worshippers of Hauptmann. They refuse to see in him a disciple or imitator of Ibsen and rate the vaporings of a Hassenreuter in "The Rats" more highly than they do the aspirations of a Rosmer in "Rosmersholm." Hauptmann is the fashion in the Germany of to-day, and as the recipient of a Nobel prize he is talked and written about in other countries; but with all his great talent and the excellence of some of his work, he has not touched the universal heart nor satisfied the thought of those who look beyond the fancies of the day—"le souffle vague d'une popularité trompeuse." The future is yet to speak, and the voice of the great past is still heard. Throngs may now attend the performances of "Vor Sonnenaufgang" and "Der Biberpelz," but the German people does not recite Hauptmann as it does Schiller and Goethe, or Heine and Uhland. Nor has Hauptmann enriched world-literature by one passage, one line, or one phrase. He is undeniably a force in a period of singular literary and social unrest; but he is not its poet; not even its eloquent spokesman. Above all, he has not given to the world beauty and wisdom, as have the masters whom all time reveres. He does not possess that quality which, as Sainte-Beuve says, we have the right to demand of every powerful talent: gentle moderation—"cette qualité que je demande toujours aux talents énergiques de mêler à leur force." Nor can we expect of the Hauptmann of the future what, with all his gifts, he has failed to produce in the past. Nearly all great poets have had their period of immaturity and turbulence, but genius steadily ripens towards perfection. Hauptmann has given us, years after the lyric charm of "Die versunkene Glocke," the ghastly modernism of "Gabriel Schillings Flucht" and the cheap flippancy of "Atlantis," which, but for its striking, though fortuitous, forecast of an ocean catastrophe, would rise in no way above the ephemeral novels of the day. The world of serious thought and immutable good taste has not yet learned to adjust itself to the new order of things which sees in the violence of naturalism the prophecy of the future. "We cannot yet afford," says Emerson, "to drop Homer, nor Æschylus, nor Plato, nor Aristotle, nor Archimedes."

Forbes-Robertson is devoting the whole of this week to an elaborate revival of Bernard Shaw's "Cæsar and Cleopatra," of which he produced a condensed version here eight years ago. Now he gives the whole play, without much profit to the entertainment by the restoration of the hitherto suppressed parts. Dramatically the piece is lacking in action, cohesion, credibility, and suspense, while historically it is fantastic. Essentially it is extravaganza of a very superior order. The satirically witty text, with its characteristically Shavian shafts directed against all sorts of British prejudices and conventions in the social, artistic, religious, and military worlds, is as fresh as ever, and, of course, in many instances, as disingenuous. The delight of the audience was manifested in continuous ripples of laughter. Forbes-Robertson's Cæsar is now an admirably finished impersonation and an almost perfect illustration of the manner in which the best burlesque should be played, that is, with absolute sincerity. Without losing any of the humor of a grotesque misrepresentation, he, by sheer acting power, gives the character consistency, vitality, and dignity. His masterly elocution, of course, gives the fullest effect to all the varied excellences of the lines. Miss Elliott's Cleopatra is not remarkable except for its physical charm, and the general support, though adequate, is not brilliant.

"The Great Adventure," a stage adaptation by Arnold Bennett of his story "Buried Alive," with which Winthrop Ames has opened his new Booth Theatre, is a badly made play. The construction, which is loose and roughly jointed, betrays the awkwardness and inexperience of the amateur, but the central idea is fresh and ingenious, the characterization is deft and animated, while the dialogue is lively and well charged with satirical humor. As the piece is described on the programme as fanciful, the incidents need not be judged by too precise a standard of reason. Manifestly the bare proposition that, in any circumstances, a painter of great fame and genius—however shy, nervous, and irresponsible—would, or could, knowingly permit his dead valet to be identified as himself and be buried in his stead in Westminister Abbey, being content to take the valet's place as husband of the pretty, shrewd, but illiterate widow who responded to the dead man's matrimonial advertisement, is extravagantly preposterous. And there are other premises equally inadmissible. Mr. Bennett's object, apparently, was to contrast the vagaries of undisciplined genius with the more substantial virtues of a warm heart and a hard head, and this he has done in amusing fashion. But the chief merit of the piece resides in the vivacious satire directed against all kinds of British conventions and social hypocrisies. Some of this is somewhat trite, but most of it is smart and humorously effective. The ignorance of journalistic critics, Philistinism in art, social influence in the manufacture of fictitious reputations, clerical advertisement and insincerity, rapturous feminine gush, vulgar sensationalism, the rapacity of a certain class of picture dealers, the gullibility of some self-constituted connoisseurs, and the liberal bestowal upon the undeserving dead of praise denied to the worthy living, are among the topics of spirited ridicule. In almost every way the literary outshines the dramatic quality of the piece, which, however, is by no means devoid of interesting situations. The general representation is excellent, especially in the case of the subordinate actors, but Lyn Harding, clever actor as he is, scarcely does full justice to the very difficult part of the leading character. The superficial side of him, the intense nervousness, utter impracticability, and restless excitability, combined with a complete lack of self-dependence, he interprets with notable technical skill, but he fails to give any prominence to the finer underlying intellectual and emotional attributes essential to the presumption of genius and necessary to the creation of sympathy. So purely whimsical a person as he pictures would not be likely to win the whole-souled devotion of so level-headed a heroine.

Music

Studies in Musical Education, History, and Æsthetics. Seventh Series. $1.60.

The seventh series of Papers and Proceedings of the Music Teachers' National Association, issued under the general head of Studies in Musical Education, History, and Æsthetics, is no less valuable than its predecessors. While some of the proceedings recorded are of interest only to members of the Association, most of the papers appeal to all who use their brains in teaching or practicing the musical art, as distinguished from those to whom "the sensuous factor in music is the sole one," to cite the words used by the president of the Association, James M. Taylor, in his address of welcome, in which, among other things, he expressed regret that our colleges do not yet "rank the training of piano practice beside that of laboratories of physics and chemistry."

"Physics and Music" is the subject of an interesting paper in this volume by Prof. Edna Carter, of Vassar College. After speaking of the work of Helmholtz, whose acoustic doctrines have stood the test of time remarkably well, and of the lessons taught by the gramophone and the photographic records of modes of vibration, she describes in detail some important work undertaken by D. C. Miller, professor of physics in the Case School of Applied Science in Cleveland. The question he set to work to answer was: "Is the tone quality of a flute the tube of which is made of gold superior to that of a flute having a tube of silver or wood? If there is a difference, what is its cause?" He first thought to spend a few months on the problem, then decided it would take a few years; and now he plans to devote his whole life to it, if necessary, although he has already reached the conviction that the gold flute is best. Incidentally, the lecturer made a statement to which the attention of Oscar Hammerstein and other builders of new theatres or concert halls should be called: "Professor Sabine, of Harvard, has solved for us the important problem of architectural acoustics, and in future there will be no excuse for the construction of an auditorium of any sort whose acoustics are unsuited to its needs."

If there be any educators who still doubt the utility of automatic musical instruments, they would do well to read the paper on "The Regeneration of Philistia" by Prof. Leo R. Lewis, of Tufts College. In that college, as he points out, such instruments have been in use since 1899; there are now four, with nearly a thousand rolls. With a little preliminary guidance the students soon play, comprehend, and enjoy the scores of the great masters. Professor Lewis is convinced that if teachers prescribed a few hours' work each week with automatic players they would soon be "astounded at the advances made in real musicianship." Another way of making students acquainted with masterworks is suggested by Edward W. Bergé, who calls attention to effective arrangements of difficult and complicated pieces for two pianos, with two or four players.

Parents who mortgage farms to enable their daughters to study music in the large cities would do well to read Mrs. Caroline Gardner Bartlett's paper on "The Singer and His Environment," in which she points out the many pitfalls prepared for such girls by unscrupulous teachers. Of the other papers in this book the one which makes perhaps the widest appeal is by Prof. Leonard B. McWhood, who suggests, as a remedy for the raucousness of the average college yell, the substitution of a college call having musical value:

A friend recently said that he could think of nothing more inspiring than the shouting by 20,000 voices, at a football game, of the heavy "Rah! Rah! Rah!" of Harvard, or the sharp "Rah! Rah! Rah!" of Yale. The writer's reply was: "Imagine 20,000 Harvard or Yale men, under the same circumstances, singing out their university ideals in a musical call whose dignity and value should equal that of the Wagnerian motive of Siegfried, Guardian of the Sword!"

Other topics discussed in this volume (copies of which may be obtained of Waldo S. Pratt, Hartford, Conn.) are Church Music and the Gregorian System, Modern English Organ Playing and Composition, The Teacher and his Material, The History of Musical Degrees, The Possibilities of Thematic Indexing.

"The coming season will prove the richest in novelties and revivals of any at the Metropolitan since the beginning of my directorate," said Mr. Gatti-Casazza the other day. The opening week will witness a revival of Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera," with Caruso, Amato, Destinn, Matzenauer, Hempel. In the third week Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" will be staged, with Hempel, Case, Ober, Goritz. For Christmas week the novelty will be Montemezzi's "L'Amore dei tre re," with Bori, Amato, Didur. "Carmen," with Farrar, Bori, and Caruso, is booked for the first half of January, and the same month will see the première of Victor Herbert's new opera, "Madeleine," with Alda, Sparkes, Althouse, Scotti. Charpentier's "Julien" will be given before the end of February, the cast including Farrar, Caruso, and Gilly. Wolf-Ferrari's new opera, "L'Amore Medico," will be heard in March. Verdi's "Falstaff" will be the season's last novelty. A brilliant opening of the season is assured by "Manon," with Farrar, Caruso, Gilly, Rothier, and De Segurola.

Heretofore New York has been far behind Berlin in the opportunities to hear the best music performed in the best possible manner at specially low rates. From this point of view great interest attaches to two announcements just made by the New York Philharmonic, which is equal in make-up to any orchestra in Berlin, or any other city, abroad or at home. During the present season the Philharmonic will affiliate with the Wage Earners' League in three monster concerts at Madison Square Garden. These concerts will be given with an increased orchestra and celebrated artists as assisting soloists, and they are intended to further the educational policy of the Philharmonic Society by placing the highest class of music within reach of wage earners of limited means. The prices of admission will be so small that only the enormous seating capacity of New York's great amphitheatre makes the scheme a possibility.

In further pursuance of its educational policy, the Philharmonic Society announces that this season, at its regular Thursday evening and Friday afternoon concerts 250 seats will be available to music students and pupils at 25 cents each.

The attempt to produce "Pelléas et Méli-sande" and the "Rosenkavalier" in English has not proved a success in the English provinces. "Half-filled houses" have greeted Mr. Denhof and his company at Birmingham and elsewhere. He has an expensive orchestra, and he charges $3 to $5 for the best seats, which helps to explain the situation.

Edyth Walker, who, some years ago, won deserved popularity at the Metropolitan Opera House, and then left her native country to sing in German opera houses, where she soon was rated in the front rank of dramatic vocalists, has lately been winning fresh laurels in England. Of her singing of a scene from "Oberon" the London Times said: "The splendid quality of her voice, the breadth of her phrasing, and her dramatic intensity made her performance one of the most striking features of the whole day's work."

Art

SPANISH MASTERS.

LONDON, October 11.

An interesting exhibition of Spanish old masters has just been opened at the Grafton Gallery, and is to remain open for three or four months. Its object is the support of the National Art-Collections Fund in England and the Sociedad de Amigos del Arte Española in Spain. Its reason, according to the Historical Introduction to the Catalogue, is that the time is ripe for such an exhibition. To those who are not responsible for the show, this reason is not so obvious. There was a fine exhibition of Spanish masters at the New Gallery in 1895-96, and again at the Guildhall in 1901; the Royal Academy has given much space in its winter exhibitions to the Spanish pictures owned in England. But maybe it is not so much the British public that has been taken into consideration—not so much the British public for whom the time is ripe—as the little group of experts and critics who see in these historic exhibitions a splendid field for their Battle of Attributions, and the little group of private dealers who have no objection to making use of them if the opportunity offers. However, it does not so much matter what the reason is or may be, when the result is of such value to the few with a genuine love for art. It would have had greater value had more care been shown in the selection, and had perhaps one-half the number of pictures now on the walls been hung. But the inferior work can be forgiven and passed by because of the masterpieces.

The care seems to have been rather to make the show as official and socially correct as possible. The King of Spain is the patron. The list of the committee bristles with distinguished names, both English and Spanish. Mr. Herbert Cook is the chief organizer of the exhibition; Mr. Maurice W. Brockwell has prepared the catalogue. With two or three notable exceptions, all the owners of Spanish paintings in England have contributed, from the King at Buckingham Palace to so little-known a provincial source as the Bowes Museum at Barnard Castle. Several Spanish collectors are also among the contributors.

And if the standard might have been more rigorous, at least a collection has been got together that ranges over a period beginning with the Primitives of the thirteenth century and ending with the master of the nineteenth, Goya. The group of Primitives, however, is disappointing, not only because it is small, but because it contains little of very great distinction. No doubt some of the panels in their original place over an altar, or decorating a shrine, made their effect, and certainly all have an historic value. But one picture alone among them stands out as the work of an artist, as well as of the skilled craftsman trained in the traditional school, and this is the St. Michael by Vermejo, splendid in design, the figure spirited and full of action, Satan beneath the Saint's feet squirming to fine decorative purpose; but this panel was in the same gallery two years ago, when I remember writing in detail about it. The Spanish Primitives are not so easy to see in London as the Italian, and the series, if incomplete, will be of use to students by enabling them to follow the development of Spanish art from its earliest days and trace its inspiration if they choose, partly to the Italians who at that remote period visited Spain, and partly to Jan Van Eyck, who also was a visitor to the country. It is astonishing how far artists travelled at a time when travelling was anything but easy, so that any one school could never be quite independent in its ideas and methods.

After Vermejo come the portrait painters of the sixteenth century, they in their turn owing something to Antonio Mor, who was received at the court of Philip II. The series by Sanchez Coello show that Velasquez had a predecessor who understood how to give dignity and distinction to royal and imperial sitters, and sometimes a splendid technical touch and splendor of color to their dress. There is a portrait of a youth, who may or may not have been a Spanish prince, that is simply extraordinary in the way the figure maintains its dignity and concentrates in itself the interest of the design, though the elaborate pattern of the cloak is worked out with photographic minuteness in its infinite detail. Examples of Navarrete, too, are here. Also of Herrera the elder, whose small painting of a Partridge on the Wing, impressive in color and masterly in drawing, is a proof that Velasquez, in his first master, was more fortunate than many a young genius; while the Portrait of a Knight of Santiago by Pacheco testifies no less to the ability of the second master of Velasquez, from whom it is evident he had nothing to unlearn, though he carried the old tradition far beyond Pacheco's reach.

All the same, in the present exhibition anyway, the one artist of the sixteenth century, the one artist after Vermejo, who towers before Velasquez appears (that is, in order of time, not of the hanging), is El Greco, who, if Greek by nationality, was Spanish by choice, and is always ranked with the Spanish school. It has become the correct thing to talk of him as the first Post-Impressionist—a Post-Impressionist born four centuries too soon. The sixteen examples at the Grafton—of such varying merit that I wish they could have been reduced to half a dozen—hardly justify this appropriation, nor do any others that I have seen. El Greco had the individuality in his point of view and his method of expression that most Post-Impressionists struggle for by scrupulously imitating somebody else; but no great artist ever yet achieved greatness except by the development of his own individuality in his work. Velasquez might as well be called a Post-Impressionist as El Greco. Like all other great artists, El Greco's earlier paintings show the influence of the masters of his day, and there is at the Grafton a small Christ Driving the Money-Lenders out of the Temple which, in the color, the types, the movement of the figures, is distinctly Venetian. Indeed, in two paintings of St. Peter and St. Francis, he barely escapes the sentiment and sweetness of the Spanish painter of religious subjects, and in the strange Christ Led to Calvary, it is rather because of the entirely individual and chilling color scheme and the astonishing realism of the arrangement, than any of the exaggeration, the restlessness, of drawing usually associated with his name, that a personality may be seen breaking through school conventions. The beautiful portrait of his daughter, which no one can forget who visited the Guildhall Exhibition in 1901, is as full of dignity and restraint as a Velasquez. It is only when you come to the Supper in the House of Simon, shown already in the Grafton two or three years ago, that you find the peculiar exaggeration, restlessness, distortion almost, in the drawing of the figures and the spacing of the color, that has misled Post-Impressionism into looking upon him as their prophet. This exaggeration, found also in two or three portraits in the series, has been by some authorities accounted for by astigmatism of the eye. But though the chief cause might have been a physical defect in his vision, it seems more probable that the style he eventually developed came from the over-emphasis in characterization that grew upon him, as a painter's mannerisms will. As, in our own time, Carrière insisted more and more upon atmosphere until at the end his figures were in danger of being lost in fog, as Matthys Maris grows more and more mystic until such of his later work as he shows remains an enigma to which he alone has the clue; so it seems as if El Greco preoccupied himself with character and its expression until he verged upon caricature, for I do not know what else to call it—not the cruel caricature of the satirist, not the tender caricature of the humorist, but the caricature of the earnest student seeking beauty in character and striving to get at the very essence of truth in his record.

The supreme masters have always escaped the pitfalls of exaggeration and mannerism. It is a relief to turn from El Greco, who at his best is disquieting, to Velasquez, who, in his superb repose, towers above all his countrymen of whatever age or school. The modern critic, busy grinding his own axe, has been guilty of many absurdities, but never of one greater than when he would dethrone Velasquez and exalt El Greco in his place. Twenty-seven paintings in the collection are attributed to the master, but in many cases the attribution is an insult. I suppose it would be a delicate matter in a Loan Exhibition to take from a picture the name of the artist which the owner tags on to it; on the other hand, it would be simple to refuse the picture. However, in the most glaring instances even the credulous public will not be deceived. Some of the finer examples in the country are missing, especially those from Kingston Lacy and Dulwich. But Apsley House and Dorchester House have contributed from their treasures, and if only quality had been preferred to quantity, an impressive group would have remained. For the expert, whose pleasure in a picture is measured not by its beauty but by the chance it gives him for a display of his own erudition, the interest centres about three paintings which I believe have not been hitherto exhibited or known. One is The Dying Gladiator, lent by Mr. F. D. Walenn, recently discovered, the catalogue states, in private hands in Sweden: a study of a nude, the pose presenting a most difficult problem in foreshortening, which is solved with such knowledge and good painting that no harm would be done to Velasquez's fame if it were finally catalogued with his school work, though other accomplished painters of his generation might have produced just such an "academy." The second is The Kitchen Maid from Mr. Otto Beit's collection, a long, narrow panel, full of masterly detail and beautiful in tone, that may well belong to the early period when Velasquez painted the Duke of Wellington's Old Woman Frying Eggs, now hanging close by. The third is The Angels Appearing to the Shepherds, a discovery of Mr. Marion H. Spielmann's, who seems to have a talent for discovery. I understand that some critics have accepted his present attribution, but those who look for proofs in the painting itself rather than in its pedigree will probably not be so easily convinced. Two shepherds rest by a stream where their sheep are drinking, while above in the sky float two little cherubs in a swirl of drapery. The whole arrangement is a triumph of what an early school of writers on art used to call chiaroscuro and much admire. Out of all but impenetrable shadow, the high lights on one of the cherubs, on the uplifted hand of the shepherd in the foreground, on the backs of the sheep, jump out with a violence that I have never yet seen in a Velasquez. There is no breadth in the handling, the drawing has not the master's touch. It frequently happens in the game of attributions that the pedigree may be all right, but the picture all wrong. However, I willingly leave the dispute to Mr. Spielmann and his experts and authorities, for surely it is waste of time to hunt for Velasquez in an uninteresting canvas when he asserts himself so triumphantly, so without the shadow of a doubt, in a long succession of masterpieces.

Here the notable examples of his art are the Portrait of Quevedo, the Portrait of a Spanish Gentleman, one version of the Pope Innocent X from the Duke of Wellington's collection, the Queen Mariana from the Ford collection, A Lady with a Mantilla from the Duke of Devonshire's, the early Philip IV of Spain from Sir George Holford's. All these are known and have been seen in comparatively recent years at the Academy, the Guildhall, or the New Gallery, but the opportunity to see them again is one that no lover of art can afford to miss. The Philip, a large, life-size, full-length standing figure, young, the face still, firm, and fresh, a richness of gold and crimson in the dress that Velasquez did not always allow him, rules it in the Gallery as the King who posed once ruled it in the Court of Spain. And the Spanish Gentleman, to the right of the Philip, severe, sombre, only the simple white linen collar relieving the severity of his black robe, is as commanding in his own way, and if less splendid a figure, as beautiful in his sober dignity. It would be better if these two portraits were come to in the very last of the galleries, for it must be confessed that the work of Velasquez's successors does not bear the test of comparison.

Murillo is almost as plentifully represented, but it is seldom that his large religious paintings excite any emotion save admiration for their dexterity. If his beggar boys could have been sent from Dulwich, another impression might have been given. As it is, most of his big canvases leave one cold, with no desire to pause except before that excellent but affected half-length portrait of himself, seen through an oval with an inscription below, made familiar by reproductions, and before the full-length, life-size Portrait of a Man in picturesque dress of black and white, which, after the Velasquez, is among the best portraits in the exhibition.

If Murillo leaves one cold, the painters who follow do not call for any recognition, negative or otherwise. It may have been thought advisable to include them for the sake of the historical sequence, but they add nothing to the artistic interest, and I doubt if a visitor in a hundred stops to look at them. Some of their paintings struck me as little better than the old masters, as they looked under time's coating of dust and grime, that used to hang in the typical London lodging-house of twenty-five or thirty years ago. These painters give the greater value to Goya when, finally, Goya is reached.

With Goya a new individuality appears in Spanish art, a painter with no less distinct a point of view of his own than El Greco. It is therefore to be wished that he had been better represented. One side of his art is seen, it is true, in two small studies of a madhouse and a prison, two small, cool, gray interiors filled, the first with fantastic figures, the second with writhing, manacled prisoners; while another side can be studied in four or five portraits: the Duchess of Alva with her dog, the painter's brother, the hard, dry-lipped poet, Melendez-Valdez, and, of more note apart from association, a Spanish Lady, with strange eyes gleaming from under her heavy black hair, thick and low on her forehead, long earrings dangling from her ears, a whitish gray shawl drawn tight around her shoulders, something defiant, something mystifying, in the ugly but interesting face which both attracts and repels. The group is one in which the student of Goya may rejoice; to any one ignorant of his art, it will not reveal either the extent of his powers or the reason for his reputation.

But Goya might be more adequately represented, El Greco might be seen only in his most individual work, and the splendid Philip, in the freshness of youth, the Spanish Gentleman, in the austerity of years, would still triumph over the collection, as they do now.

THE PRESENT MOOD OF WALL STREET.

The spirit of pessimism which has for some weeks past prevailed in Wall Street, and which embodied itself in a general decline on the Stock Exchange, has had several causes, of which perhaps the most weighty has been the discovery that the Balkan War, and the financial derangement which accompanied it, had left Europe's financial organism in a weakened condition. This found expression in the dearness of foreign money markets when autumn began, with a consequent reaction of foreign trade activity. It left the European investing communities distrustful, and all these foreign tendencies necessarily affected our own markets.

At home, we had to face two uncertainties—the question whether some unsettlement of business plans would not have to follow the lower tariff, and the question whether or not an acrimonious dispute would be provoked between banks and Government, if a banking bill unsatisfactory to the banks were to be enacted. So far as actual developments are concerned, the course of trade has been less disturbed by the tariff changes than there was reason to anticipate, and the recent trend of discussion on the banking bill has suggested that mutual compromises may smooth out the deadlock of opinion. But there was nothing visible, in either quarter, to excite immediate enthusiasm; both measures were bound to be more or less experimental, and meantime the country's harvest results for 1913, taken as a whole, have fallen below the best of recent years.

In a general way, these facts account for the unfavorable view of things which the Stock Exchange has been taking. But they are not the explanations which are most frequently heard on the Stock Exchange itself. In that home of restless conjecture, one would learn, last week, that the trouble lay in the "anti-Trust policy of the Administration" (particulars not supplied); in the plunge into fiat money if the banking and currency bill were passed; and, by way of embellishment, in the "rumors" that the Bank of England was about to borrow gold from the Bank of France and that the Pennsylvania Railroad had in view a billion-dollar loan.

The reason why people of experience and intelligence accept with reserve the current Wall Street explanations lies in their knowledge of Wall Street itself. Wall Street is remarkably quick in showing by the action of its market that something is wrong somewhere in the financial organism; but it is one of the slowest, blindest, and most credulous of all communities in pointing out what the trouble is. When all stocks advance on the Exchange, the explanation that capital, previously tied up against an emergency which never came, has been released for the market's purposes, may lie absolutely on the surface of things. But it is much more to Wall Street's taste to assume that St. Paul, Amalgamated Copper, Atchison, and United States Steel are rising because Union Pacific has talked of distributing its assets to its shareholders in an "extra dividend." When a great break in prices occurs, and the newspaper dispatches simultaneously report the possibility of a diplomatic break between England and Germany, it is quite as likely as not that Wall Street will see no particular connection between them. If rumors happen to be current as to an "anti-Trust suit," the trend of the stock market will be exclusively ascribed to it.

It is this perfectly familiar tendency which at the present time warrants skepticism over all prevalent "explanations" in the financial district. Proving a negative is not easy, particularly when every one admits that constant reiteration of a fanciful theory regarding causes of the decline will induce some timid souls to sell stocks on the precise grounds alleged. The disposition to put the blame on any concrete fact is also more natural when, as at present, the main troublesome influences are out of sight, and perhaps embody merely the automatic sequel to the formidable political and financial crisis which prevailed in Europe during so great a part of the past twelve months. It is an occasion on which, if nothing better offered, one can imagine the Stock Exchange ascribing the day's decline in prices to the vote of the Sulzer impeachment court. That was at least an event, and Wall Street insists on new explanations.

It is doubtless an unlucky coincidence that, with the general underlying conditions of the hour not very favorable, the controversy over the lower tariff and the currency plan should have been before us. Yet it may not be out of place to ask whether (Wall Street being what it is) these very same factors might not have been used to a purport exactly opposite, if the general position of affairs financial had been such as to cause enthusiasm. Supposing that Europe's affairs had reached an entirely comfortable status, and that our harvests had been in 1913 what they were in 1912—is it rash to suggest that the Stock Exchange might have been basing prophecy of "boom times" on the larger business possible when artificial tariff barriers had been cut down, and when a scientific system of centralizing our bank reserves and credit resources had been established?

IMPORTANT NEW PUBLICATIONS

Letters of Charles Eliot Norton

With Biographical Comment by his daughter, Miss SARA NORTON, and Mr. M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE.

The two volumes will add a uniquely important contribution to the literary history of the nineteenth century in America and England, and to the general knowledge of the long period covered by Professor Norton's life. The man himself speaks throughout as in an autobiography.

Norton's place in the personal history of his contemporaries has been clearly shown by means of many biographies published during the last twenty years. We have had in separate form Ruskin's letters to Norton, and in more general collections a great number of the letters he received from Clough, Lowell, Curtis, FitzGerald, Godkin, Leslie Stephen, and many others. We have seen in what affection and sympathy his intimates held him. The mass of letters from which these volumes are drawn present the counterpart of the pictures—both in showing his feeling for these men, and in revealing the qualities which so truly and deeply endeared him to them.

But the book is much more than a record of Norton's contemporaries. His own activities, as a student of art and letters, as a moulder of public opinion,—especially in editorial work in the decade of the Civil War,—as a teacher of youth, as a stimulating friend to many who through varied agencies were strengthening the thought and spirit of their time,—all these activities are strikingly illustrated. Norton's letters and the story of his career, which is told chiefly by means of them, will appeal to all to whom the intellectual, political, and artistic life of the nineteenth century is a matter of concern.

HAGAR

BY

MARY JOHNSTON

Author of "To Have and To Hold," etc.

In "Hagar" Miss Johnston has written the book that her admirers have always wished for and, latterly, expected—a powerful story of the present day. She brings her heroine from secluded Virginia to the whirlpool of New York.

"Hagar" realizes the breadth, the narrowness, and finally the full proportion of a woman's life, passing through poverty and wealth to find her happiness.

A glowing argument for the emancipation of women, a stirring human drama, a piece of noble literature—in each of its three aspects "Hagar" marks an epoch in Miss Johnston's career as a thinker and writer.

A REVISED EDITION
TACITUS
Agricola and Germania

Edited by W. F. ALLEN. Revised by KATHARINE ALLEN, Assistant Professor of Latin in the University of Wisconsin, and G. L. HENDRICKSON, Professor of Latin and Greek Literature in Yale University.

In the new edition of this college textbook the simplicity, lucidity, and well-balanced character of the original commentary has been retained; but text and notes have been brought up to date through the addition of modern paleographical and critical material. In particular the bearing of the results of archaeological investigation in Britain has been carefully noted.

Other new and helpful features are maps, illustrative of both treatises; and appendices showing the text variation from that of the old edition and of Halm, and giving the important manuscript readings.

Cloth, 158 pages, with maps, $1.00.

FALL BOOKS

CHICAGO AND THE OLD NORTHWEST, 1673-1835. By MILO M. QUAIFE.

This book is in scope and subject-matter a history, but in language and content it is as thrillingly interesting as romance. It is a history of the founding of old Fort Dearborn at the mouth of the Chicago River at the time when the modern metropolis of Chicago was but a wilderness hunted over by Indians. It describes the "Fort Dearborn massacre," the contest of the British and Americans for the Indian trade of the great Northwest, and the Indian wars, massacres, and frontier experiences which figured in the development of Chicago. The work is the most absorbingly interesting contribution to the history of the Northwest that has appeared in years.

LONDON IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By PERCY H. BOYNTON.

The purpose of this book is new, namely: to give an idea of London atmosphere in the various literary periods, to describe the chief places of interest for successive generations, and to make a reasonably generous selection from old and new engravings and photographs. It seeks to make clear to the average and casual reader the allusions with which English literature is filled. The chapters are devoted successively to the London of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb and Byron, Dickens, Victorian London, and contemporary London. A list of illustrative readings is appended to each chapter. There are an appendix on illustrative novels, a complete index, and 40 full-page illustrations.

357 pp., crown 8vo, cloth; postpaid $2.17.

A MANUAL FOR WRITERS. By JOHN M. MANLY and JOHN A. POWELL.

A book designed to aid authors and all others who are concerned with the writing of English. It aims to answer the practical questions that constantly arise in the preparation of manuscripts for the printer, business letters, and any sort of composition where correctness of form is an important element.

It treats in a clear and convenient way the matters of grammar, spelling, and general form which writers need most to be informed about, and gives full directions on the preparation of "copy" for the printer and the correcting of proof. The chapter on letter-writing is unique and gives just the help that is constantly wanted by writers.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1913.

The Week

In spite of President Wilson's reaffirmation of his "warm advocacy and support both of the principle and of the bona-fide practice of civil-service reform," in the memorandum accompanying his signature of the Urgent Deficiency bill, friends of the merit system the country over will feel both regret and alarm at his action in the matter. The bill repeals, by the vicious process of a "rider," all the provisions of the Act of 1883 and of all subsequent civil-service-reform acts, so far as they may relate to the appointment or removal of deputy collectors of internal revenue and deputy marshals who are required to give bond for the faithful performance of their duty. That the President has power nevertheless, of his own motion, to place all or any part of these offices under the protection of the merit system rules is true enough; but the continuance of the system ought not to be dependent upon the good-will of the President for the time being. "There is no danger," says Mr. Wilson, "that the spoils principle will creep in with my approval or connivance"; but a merely personal guarantee is far from adequate compensation for a backward step taken in the law itself. And over and above the immediate mischief there is the evil of the precedent.

The schoolmaster in the White House knows how to deal with students who flunk—that is plain. His first veto, published on Thursday of last week, dealt with the case of a West Pointer who, having failed in his studies, cheerfully obtained an act of Congress to overrule the judgment of his teachers. But he forgot that he had to reckon with an ex-president of Princeton, and that gentleman has stood by the teachers. Finding there was good ground for believing that the Academic Board knew what it was about, Mr. Wilson decided against the student; in addition, he saw clearly that to grant this plea for another chance would be subversive of discipline at West Point, already weakened by Congressional interference. It is an excellent beginning of Mr. Wilson's vetoes—sound and clearly reasoned. Now, let us hope it will be followed by plenty of others—pension vetoes in particular, and vetoes of every raid on the civil service which may come hereafter—however cleverly concealed in appropriation bills.

To Secretary Daniels credit must be given for an eloquent bit of lip-service in the cause of the limitation of armaments. The moral argument against the insane competition in battleship-building is admirably put by our Secretary of the Navy when he declares that "the hysteria of naval preparations is proving too great a burden for the people." And the argument from common-sense is well formulated when he states:

> The world to-day is facing the anomaly of making its navy less adequate by increasing it. For when new vessels are built with their more powerful armament they render useless the smaller warships, except for coast defence.

Unfortunately, the same report that quotes Mr. Daniels as above goes on to say that Mr. Daniels is understood to favor a three-battleship programme, and has so told the President. Thereby, the Secretary of the Navy strikes the classic attitude of foreign statesmen whose pious wishes for the limitation of armaments are driven home by the fervent hope that the other fellow will be the one to show the way.

The respectful reception accorded by the Senate Finance Committee to Mr. Vanderlip's plan of a single central bank, under Government control, insures discussion which will in any case be useful; because all possible alternatives for which there is any valid argument ought to be fully debated in framing a measure of so great importance. For the present, we shall only say that, while the plan for a single central bank has certain undeniable advantages over any other, two grave difficulties have been encountered in all previous discussions of it. If, as the Aldrich plan provided, the bank was to be managed by appointees of the subscribing banks, a formidable centralization of power in the hands of the banking interests would be foreshadowed. If, on the other hand, it was to be controlled and managed by Presidential appointees, an equally formidable concentration of political power and patronage would be indicated. Mr. Vanderlip adopts the second expedient. His plan would have the central board consist exclusively of directors named by the President of the United States, while the bank's twelve branches would be managed by committees named by that central board.

Mr. Vanderlip's proposal is oddly out of line with the action of the American Bankers' Association, whose resolutions based their main objection on the fact that the individual banks "have no voice whatever in the selection of the Federal Reserve Board," although they would have to subscribe to stock of the regional banks. The principal speech on the resolutions declared that "management, ownership, control, and profit-sharing are the characteristics of the government monarchies of Europe, but they are not in accord with our institutions." Mr. Vanderlip suggests as one alternative complete ownership of the new bank's stock by the Government; or, if public subscription were to be preferred, he advocates that "all national banks be liable for the purchase of their pro rata proportion of any stock not taken by the public." Yet this is for an institution whose central board and whose branch directorates are alike to be managed exclusively by political appointees, as against the selection by the banks, under the present plan, of a majority in the managing boards of the regional banks! These are considerations which not only the Senate committee, but the banks, will have to take into view. We think it altogether fortunate, however, that the proposition should have been brought forward in such shape as to evoke intelligent discussion.

That the Census Bureau is more than a statistics-gathering machine is shown by the statement of the Chief Statistician to the effect that a man is not past his prime at forty. This is the sort of dictum that is worth while. It is all very well for the Bureau to issue its heavy volumes now and then, filled with figures, comparisons, and deductions regarding the number of foreign-born white paupers enumerated in almshouses, the per cent. of their distribution by country of birth, by States, and by geographical divisions, or the still more exciting subject of the number of training schools for nurses, commercial schools, manual and industrial training schools, their respective enrolments by States and by geographical divisions; but there must be more persons interested in what the authorities have to say concerning the commercial and industrial value of the man of forty than the foreign-born white paupers enumerated in almshouses and the students in nurses' training schools, commercial schools, and manual and industrial training schools combined.

The forces of nature which work for consistency have seen to it that Col. Roosevelt should not spend many hours on South American soil without an opportunity to call some one a liar. This time it is the Brazilian correspondent of a Buenos Ayres newspaper, who reported the Colonel's speech at Bahia as containing a slur on the Argentine Republic by attributing to Brazil the leadership in South America. Mr. Roosevelt, of course, said nothing of the kind. Speaking of the leading nations in the Western Hemisphere, he coupled Brazil with the United States, just as, if he were speaking in Buenos Ayres, he would associate Argentina with the United States. It will not take long to clear up the misunderstanding, and the Argentinians will rise to him with all the more enthusiasm. Or if a few disgruntled voices are raised, it will only make the Colonel feel bullier than ever. At any rate, a start has been made towards the organization of a Latin-American chapter of the Ananias Club, and the people of the United States have been by so much brought closer to their southern neighbors.

The Becker trial evoked comment upon the new spirit that seemed to be animating juries in New York, and a similar thing is noted elsewhere. The Augusta, Ga., Chronicle remarks that in that State juries are laying aside their old sentimentality and tendency to leniency. There is a stiffening of the juror's backbone. Along with this development has come a new view of technicalities. "In our own State," says the Montgomery, Ala., Journal, "we have seen murder cases carried over from year to year." At first the convicted man is sentenced to the gallows, "but gradually, as the cases are reversed time and again, the people become discouraged, and after many years have elapsed and some of the witnesses are dead or moved away, the defendants are released." This condition is now to be changed. The Supreme Court of Alabama has declared against minor technicalities, and no more cases are to be reversed unless the error is such as to affect the verdict materially.

Concern is felt by observers in the South over the increase in the number of tenant farmers as compared with those who own their land. In North Carolina, thirty years ago, 33 farmers in every 100 were tenants; the number is now 42. In South Carolina, the increase has been from 50 in 1880 to 63 in 1910. In Georgia, the number has risen from 44 to 65; in Alabama, from 46 to 60; in Mississippi, from 43 to 66; in Tennessee, from 34 to 41; in Arkansas, from 30 to 50; in Louisiana, from 35 to 55; and in Texas, from 37 to 52. Since leases are on the one-year plan, it is to the tenant's interest to "skin" the land. No method is provided by which a good tenant may receive any reward for the improvement he makes in soil fertility or in the appearance and value of the farm. Students of the matter are convinced that it is only a question of time when the South must adopt the British plan of long leases, with credit to the tenant for improvements, and with penalty for any permanent injury which he does the land he hires.

If only a tithe of the charges against the city government of East St. Louis in 1911-12 are true, the case will make a new chapter in the shame of our cities. From Mayor to 14 out of 16 Aldermen, the 28 indictments blanket a whole Administration. The charge is not of stealthy conspiracy, of crafty pilfering by an inside ring, but of free-for-all grabbing. In all departments—Controller, Health Commissioner, Chief of Detectives, Superintendent of Streets, and Deputy Building Commissioner—startling irregularities are alleged. One man has made sworn confession of accepting $1,250 for his vote on franchise grabs; the Treasurer is charged with plain embezzlement; other officials with peculation in contracts; and the Aldermen with voting themselves illegal salaries. Defence seems pitifully lacking. Inasmuch as East St. Louis has no such unsavory machine organization as other cities point to as their undoing, her citizenship and whole civil spirit would seem to be facing trial along with her public servants.

A Chicagoan has discovered that only one large city in this country is well named. That city is, of course, Chicago. Some of her rivals, such as Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and New Orleans, have mere second-hand appellations, taken from more or less obscure places in the Old World. Others, like Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Washington, are named "on a basis that is biographical." St. Louis and St. Paul "have the odor of hagiology." San Francisco and Los Angeles are open to somewhat the same objection. Kansas City and Jersey City suffer from tautology. Minneapolis and Indianapolis would do if they were not hybrids. Towards the smaller cities, the Chicago critic is more gracious. While he is a bit uncertain about Tacoma, Milwaukee, Detroit, and Buffalo, he hails Oshkosh and Kankakee with almost suspicious fervor. It may be admitted, however, as a writer in Harper's Weekly contends, that we have too many Cantons, Newports, Toledos, and Ninevehs, to say nothing of Portlands, Springfields, and Germantowns. The tendency to adopt a great name was rather ludicrously illustrated a few years ago in the suggestion that an Illinois village should be renamed London.

Far outside the circles of scholarship, the announcement of the death of Reuben Gold Thwaites will bring a feeling of distinct loss to the whole Middle West. More than to any man since Parkman, credit is due to him for the upbuilding of the romantic and colorful history of the Old Northwest. The interest of the States of the region in the French and British régimes virtually dates from his installation as superintendent of the Wisconsin Historical Society in 1886, and as editor of the Wisconsin Historical Collections in 1888. His many publications, his zeal as a collector, and his influence upon historical scholarship at the University of Wisconsin have been a leavening force long and widely acknowledged. His chief fame, of course, rests upon his resurrection of the Jesuit Relations —a resurrection as striking as the more recent discovery, in southern Illinois, of the Kaskaskia Records. But better testimony to his powers and industry lies in the many State, university, and city collections of Western history built up after his thought, and the many lecture-rooms and studies in which research is carried on after his own spirit.

Not conference, but compromise, was the substance of Mr. Asquith's announcement of policy with regard to Home Rule and Ulster. The late conference fiasco on the Constitutional question, which served only to delay the enactment of the Parliament bill and to intensify party spirit, is still a fresh memory. If the Protestant sections of Ulster insist on being omitted from the scheme for Home Rule, Mr. Asquith intimated that a way for that might be provided under the bill itself. The mode of procedure would probably be by a clause in the bill making Home Rule non-effective in those counties where a popular referendum so decided. Virtually this was the scheme adopted in the organization of the Australian Commonwealth, and in the establishment of our own Federal Government. The north-eastern counties of Ulster might flock by themselves for a while; but Mr. Asquith counts upon the centripetal forces of nationality and common economic interest to bring the recusant Protestant minority within the fold. Upon the point that an Irish Parliament in Dublin there must be, the Premier was explicit. And he was equally clear-spoken as to the determination of the Government to put the bill into force over all Ireland if, before its enactment, the men of Ulster fail to take advantage of the escape offered them.

The honor of having been the scene of the whole life-work of Sir William Thomson, afterwards Lord Kelvin, is one that any city might envy Glasgow. That city has shown its pride by the erection of a statue to the great physicist. At the unveiling ceremonies the other day, Mr. Balfour was the orator; a sufficient guaranty that the address would be worthy of the occasion. He pointed out that Kelvin was, so far as he knew, a unique example of the combination in the same mind of the highest powers in the field of abstract scientific speculation with those practical instincts which enable the inventor to make use of the results of that speculation. But, so far from drawing from Lord Kelvin's life the moral, which a less sensitive intellect might have been tempted to draw, that everybody should be encouraged to think of the practical applications of science as the end and aim of scientific research, Mr. Balfour extracted from it quite the opposite lesson. The business of the man of science, he said, is only remotely and indirectly connected with daily work or practice, and the man who pursues knowledge must pursue it for itself—that he would pursue it with far poorer effect if he was always thinking of what its practical and pecuniary results would be. In point of fact, nothing was plainer in Kelvin's own case than that his intense interest in physical and mathematical problems, the almost childlike freshness of his enthusiasm about them, was wholly independent of his extraordinary practical and pecuniary success.

The attention of lawmakers, playwrights, and even journalists might well be asked to a recent statement of Mr. Karl Pearson, head of the Galton Laboratory of the University of London. Pointing out that the ideal of the founder of eugenics was racial betterment by the scientific study of heredity and environment, and then by a popular movement emphasizing the national importance of these factors and urging their consideration by legislators and social reformers, he went on to say that before his death Sir Francis Galton was depressed by the failure to perceive that much scientific progress must be made before men started rashly to apply conclusions. "Years of patient work," says Mr. Pearson, "in medico-social observation and genetic experiment are needed before the laws of eugenics can be dogmatically stated." How much loose thinking there is in America upon eugenics is evident to any one who picks up one of the recent magazines giving an account of the "eugenic" baby exhibition in Denver, attends a "eugenic" play, reads of the "eugenic" marriage laws of Pennsylvania and the West. The harm of such loose thinking was lately remarked upon by a scientist who noted a press statement that, "eugenically," a man weak in certain physical or mental qualities should find a mate strong in those directions. Even in the eugenic millennium men will have to use their minds.

The Kaiser's artistic views have always been at variance with prevalent tastes in the German art world. He has never hesitated to formulate his critical opinions, and his loyal subjects have responded in kind when the occasion offered. They are doing so now. William II has brushed aside the awards made in an open competition for designs for a German Embassy building at Washington, and has ordered his own court architect to draw up plans. Presumably, the Kaiser has felt that the theories of the advanced schools of architecture are not representative of the German nation as a whole. Whatever may be the case with his Ambassadors, he will not have his embassies go abroad to lie for their country. The incident will in all probability fail to shake the Hohenzollern throne, but for some time to come the artists on Simplicissimus and Jugend will have a delightful time designing imaginary embassy buildings in accordance with the Kaiser's ideas.

Probably the majority of middle-aged persons in this country, if asked about the population of the Russian Empire, would say it is somewhat more than a hundred million. That is the figure it reached about thirty-five years ago, and it was less than eighty million at the time that persons sixty years old or thereabout were learning their geography lessons at school. It is somewhat startling, therefore, to come upon the statement that the estimated population of the Empire on January 1, 1912, was 171,000,000. In 1897 the population was 129,000,000; in 1859 it was 74,000,000. The growth, therefore, in little more than half a century, has been nearly 100,000,000, or more than the entire present population of the United States. And this vast increase has been only in comparatively small degree due to absorption of new territory. Russia in Europe, taken by itself, is credited with a population of more than 140,000,000, so that less than 30,000,000 is to be set down to the whole Asiatic area.

THE PRESIDENT'S IDEAL.

President Wilson's speech at Swarthmore on Saturday appears to have been misunderstood. It certainly has been abroad, if we may judge by the comments on it cabled from London. It has been in some quarters at home. The trouble comes from not carefully reading Mr. Wilson's exact words. The hasty assumption has been made that he was laying down an actual programme for Mexico. But all that he did lay down was a guiding principle. Because he spoke of a "conquest," it has been rashly concluded that he had in mind a conquest by force of arms; whereas his very application of the word to William Penn should have been sufficient to show that he had in mind only the peaceful subjugation of the great continent put by Providence at the disposal of Americans. It was their original purpose which he lauded—their determination, namely, that this land should be the home of a free and self-governing people. Then the President went on to say that he "should like to believe" that the entire hemisphere is devoted to the same high ends, and that "nowhere can any government endure which is stained by blood or supported by anything but the consent of the governed."

This, in the nature of the case, was no more than a fine aspiration. It could not be a rule by which our international relations and our diplomatic intercourse are to be in all cases controlled. It was a noble sentiment which President Wilson uttered at Swarthmore, with characteristic eloquence, and the hope which he cherishes beats in the hearts of all true lovers of their country and lovers of mankind. The President struck a note like that often set vibrating in the speeches of John Bright. It was he, for example, who once gave it as his creed: "I most devoutly believe that the moral law is not written for men alone in their individual character, but that it was written as well for nations." From this no one will have the hardihood openly to dissent. But the difficulty comes in its specific application, just as it would come in the attempt to deduce a rule of conduct towards Mexico, or any South American country, from the pious wish which President Wilson expressed on Saturday.

To jump from it to the conclusion that he will, under no circumstances, recognize a Mexican Government "stained by blood," is probably the last thing that he himself would do. Earlier in the day, in his spirited address at the rededication of Congress Hall in Philadelphia, the President remarked on the fact that one in his position to-day got little practical help from the great general principles embodied in Bills of Rights and Constitutions. What continually confronts the Executive is the specific case. In deciding what to do with it, he must face the changed day and the new circumstance as well as study the old thoughts. They will teach him the spirit in which he ought to act, but not precisely how to act. And similarly, we may be sure, President Wilson would not find a sure or safe guide in the doctrine that no Government in Mexico ought to be recognized by the United States that had its origin in violence.

As a matter of fact, Mexico has known almost no other kind of Government, and there seems, unhappily, no prospect of any other for a long time to come. The real objection to recognizing Huerta—the real internationally valid objection—was that he gave no promise of stable and secure government for Mexico. The fact that he was a disloyal officer and almost certainly particeps criminis in a foul murder might indeed make us shrink away from him in personal abhorrence. But if even the vilest of men is acquiesced in as ruler by the people of his country; if his government keeps order and makes life and property secure; if the courts are open, if business goes on, if foreigners are protected, then there is nothing to do but to shut one's eyes to the personal character of the man and think of him solely in his official and representative capacity. It was not necessary or wise to do this in the case of Huerta, for from the first there was reason to doubt whether he could maintain himself. That President Wilson was justified in his early hesitations about Huerta the event has shown. Mexico does not accept him. The country is torn by revolutions amounting now to a civil war. Gen. Huerta has proclaimed himself Dictator, and now, by decree, would increase the army to 150,000 men—five times the number that was sufficient to keep in power the military oligarchy of Porfirio Diaz. Huerta may or may not be "stained by blood"; but it is obvious that his rule is one to which the Mexican people will not submit.

So far as one can now see, there will be no immediate necessity for President Wilson to change his waiting policy towards Mexico. The so-called Mexican elections give no promise of real relief. Even if there had been anything like a Constitutional vote in the States taking part, half the territory of the republic would not abide by the result. But while this Government is waiting, it is of the highest importance to have in mind what we are waiting for. It is not for the emergence of a morally impeccable President of Mexico. It is not our business to teach Mexicans morals or even self-government. All that we can ask is a settled government in Mexico, capable of uniting the country and of discharging all international obligations. To demand more—and even this minimum is, unhappily, not in sight—would be both futile and dangerous.

TAMMANY'S OVERPLAYED HAND.

The Tammany leaders in their city of New York have visibly waked up to a fact which must be the most mortifying possible to hardened political gamblers like themselves. They have bet too high on their cards. They have overplayed their hand. Seeking to win everything, they now see themselves in peril of losing everything. On all sides they perceive signs that their effrontery and their greed are provoking a tremendous reaction against them. The whole appearance of the city campaign has completely changed in a fortnight. Tammany is thrown into confusion and consternation by a series of terrific attacks. Up and down the city the name of Murphy has become the signal for cries of execration. Most alarming of all to the Tammany mind, the election betting odds have gone about and now favor Mitchel. Many who were expecting to vote for McCall are abandoning him. Evarts is said to have remarked to a Republican orator, about to make speeches for Blaine, that he could understand how a man might vote for Blaine, but did not see how anybody could defend him. In very much that plight stands the Tammany candidate, with the election only five days away.

Indications are not lacking that Tammany is at last conscious that it has been grossly overdoing it these past few weeks. This is especially the case in the matter of its dealings with Sulzer. Its savage turning on an old "pal" like him now begins to appear a political blunder worse than a crime. The Tammany leaders thought that they could destroy Sulzer; but, like the assassin who rushed upon Giuliano dei Medici, in their fury they wounded themselves with their own daggers. The poorer a creature they made Sulzer out, the more despicable did they themselves appear. Sulzer has now only to harangue the East Side, and howls of rage at Murphy, with threats of vengeance on Tammany, fill the air. Never was there a clearer proof that those politicians do not know their own business who do not use their power moderately; that a grievance such as Tammany has given Sulzer is a powerful make-weight in politics; and that the unscrupulous and remorseless pressing of an advantage over an opponent in public life is the greatest mistake that anybody in public life can make.

To all this Tammany has finally become alive. No doubt it is un peu tard, as La Fontaine and Charles F. Murphy would say, but it has come. And the way in which the swinish rush now bids fair to be only down a steep place into the sea, is an example of human folly, and its punishment, from which Plato or Burke would not have disdained to draw wisdom. Even within Tammany the feeling is now obvious that it is a case of too much Murphy. Hence the renewal of the hints that he is about to retire as Boss; that he is anxious about his health, dejected by the assaults upon him, and so on.

But while such a result may be looked upon with unalloyed satisfaction, it is impossible to contemplate the process with unmixed pleasure. In some of its phases, it illustrates a deplorable condition of mind among large sections of the community; and in the conduct of Sulzer himself there is that which breeds not only displeasure but disgust. He is indeed "the same old Bill"—the same impudence, the same colossal conceit, the same want of regard for the truth. Let any man read the preposterous story which he has put out of the conversation between himself and Allan Ryan, and then read the plain, straightforward, and convincing reply immediately made by Ryan. No intelligent person can doubt which of these statements is the truth and which a fabrication; and this latest exhibition of Sulzer's quality cannot fail to give a new edge to the feeling of shame that such a man should have been chosen for the highest honor in the gift of the people of this State. But he might convict himself of plain ordinary lying a hundred times, as he has been convicted of making false returns of campaign contributions and of appropriating such contributions to his own use, without dampening in the least the ardor of his fanatical followers. Rabbi Coffee, of Pittsburgh, a man eminent in the work of social betterment and the fight against political corruption in that city, who happens now to be in New York, has raised his voice in protest against this blind frenzy to which more than one minister, Christian as well as Jewish, has lent countenance. "The rabbi," he declared, "must stand for moral ideas, must fight for eternal principles, never for men, and surely not for those found guilty after a fair trial." With the mass of the Sulzer enthusiasts, however, this will be but as the voice of one crying in the wilderness.

POLONIUS AND THE ZEITGEIST.

An evening with Mr. Sothern or with Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, at their respective play-houses, reveals the fact that there is one character in "Hamlet" whom it would be even more difficult to omit than the Prince of Denmark. We refer to the Lord Chamberlain at the court of Denmark. Study the people in the seats, and it will appear that no matter how acutely they respond to the solemn cadences of "To be or not to be," they respond more intimately, more easily, more humanly to Polonius when he speeds his son Laertes on the voyage to France. One can almost hear the sigh of satisfaction that runs through the auditorium, one almost perceives the general half-suppressed thrill of delight, the silent accompaniment of the lips, when the old man begins his familiar text, "Give thy thoughts no tongue, nor any unproportion'd thought his act." The roots of memory that run back into the schoolroom thrill with life again. At such a moment an audience of men and women enjoys that absolute absorption into the fable which is given only to very young children to enjoy when they allow themselves to be entranced by the words of a story which they know by heart.

It is the familiarity of the scene that grips the audience, and hardly its merits. Just why these lines of advice to Laertes should have been inserted in the text cannot be explained on any other ground than that the author had a few gnomic sentences in his head on the subject of success in life, and thought the third scene of the first act of "Hamlet" as good a place as any. The situation does not demand them. Laertes, it will be recalled, has already been to France, whence he returned to attend the coronation of Hamlet's uncle. Apparently, the upper classes at the time felt no obligation to see Denmark first. In the gay capital of Europe Laertes must have acquired a fund of experience and knowledge which his father, for all his years, could hardly match. All this advice, therefore, about how to wear clothes and to form acquaintanceship, while it might have been appropriate enough for, say, young Hamlet when he first set out for Wittenberg, must have been quite thrown away on the young cosmopolite Laertes. His sister was cleverer in this respect than her father. When Laertes, on parting, admonishes her to be circumspect with regard to Prince Hamlet, Ophelia makes it quite plain that she thinks his a case in which pious admonition should begin at home.

But this is somewhat beside the question. The salient fact is that a modern audience, even allowing for the spell of childhood associations, finds nothing ludicrous in the spectacle of a father offering advice to his son. Far from that, the audience looks forward to the scene. The habit of making it a parent's privilege and duty to bestow counsel upon his son when he sends him out into the world has persisted in spite of recurrent insurrections by the young. Every generation tries to oppose the desires and instincts of the young to the wariness and disenchantment of their elders, but paternal advice is as popular as ever. What an anthology of such paternal advice one might gather out of the world's novels and plays, from Proverbs to the infallible remedy against digestive trouble which David Balfour's mother bequeathed to him. The elder's privilege to warn and instruct has maintained itself as vigorously as the young man's privilege to hear and forget.

Still, habits do die with time. How long will this venerable paternal prerogative endure? Possibly Polonius, in his heart of hearts, may have had his doubts as to what he really could teach this grown-up, travelled son of his. How much harder is it for the modern father, whose modern child is brought up on modern school programmes and reads the same modern newspaper that his father does! Is there anything, from the way apples grow and carbon is made to the mysteries of physiology, that Laertes to-day could not teach Polonius? Fortunate for the Lord Chamberlain of Denmark that he did not live to see the Century of the Child! His inability to distinguish a cloud from a camel and a weasel would have made him an object of derision to youthful classes in nature-study. The times will soon be completely out of joint for Polonius. The audiences still like him, but that is because "Hamlet" audiences are naturally old-fashioned.

MRS. WHARTON'S MANNER.

Mrs. Wharton's early successes as a writer of short stories were not the chance successes of a tyro. She had already served her apprenticeship, without making the public pay for the crude products of that trying phase of experience. She had learned what she wanted to do, and how to do it. She could take a situation or an episode involving two or three human figures, and wring the truth from it—the truth as she personally saw it. She could drive home her interpretation with witty phrase and epigram. She could make people "sit up," without the use of vulgar stimulants. If there was one quality which pleased her audience more than her brilliancy, it was her breeding. A final zest was given to the enjoyment of her style by the sense that it was gentlemanlike. That sense was misleading, of course, for she has always been strongly feminine; but it is possible for a voice a trifle deeper than common, a gesture somewhat more frank, to enhance the charm of femininity by its hint of contradiction.

But beneath the suavity and self-possession of her manner there has always been a restless spirit, and the time passed soon when the exercise of wit and adroitness could soothe it. She had, besides, the resources of the study, and the riches of art. Turning from the short story to the novel, she called them to her aid. She ranged herself in that school of sophistication, of finesse, half-lights, and rich, dim accessories, which was then ascendant. She knew her Meredith, her James, her Howells, and the greater masters of France—Bourget, Stendhal, and the rest. She wished to address herself to no vulgar audience. The very titles of those earlier books, "The Greater Inclination," "Crucial Instances," "The Valley of Decision," were a snub to the populace and a challenge to the fastidious. The populace does not deal in comparatives, nuances, reservations, compunctions.

There lies, however, between the reading masses and the small choir of the elect, a surprising body of persons, chiefly feminine, who aspire to sophistication and connoisseurship. The aspiration, as applied to literature, was more fashionable ten years ago than now, perhaps. Certainly a good many readers who aspired in that way were attracted to Mrs. Wharton's earlier novels. To wander through the pages of "The Valley of Decision," for example, was to breathe an atmosphere of polite and erudite adventure, in lands where life had become a finished thing long before American crudity began. It was not a very good story as a story; but the charm of its style, of its leisurely winding along paths of old-world glamour, was indubitable. There was something else—the occurrence here and there of an episode vivid and telling, the work not of the gentleman and scholar and agreeable cicerone, under whose guidance we seemed, for the most part, to be quietly progressing, but of Mrs. Wharton, the story-teller.

Looking back, from this remove, we suspect that those episodes, so incidentally and even negligently vouchsafed, were the most genuine part of the book: the rest, a brilliant tour de force. Its very elegance, its languor, its abstention from display of wit or from excess of any sort, mark it as a feat. For Mrs. Wharton is not a gentleman or a reflective philosopher. She is a nervous, cultivated American woman, an extremely clever performer on one of the favorite instruments of the hour: a virtuoso, but in the popular sense of the word. And she has been too clever not to find her way instinctively to the larger audience which was ready for her.

With "The House of Mirth" she captured it. Here, almost in the flesh, was that society to which striving America looks up with delighted consternation. Here was a story of the "Four Hundred" written from the inside, a moving picture of high life. It could have been the work of no one but Mrs. Wharton, and yet was plainly the work of another than the Mrs. Wharton of "The Dilettante" or "The Valley of Decision." Both her wit and her erudition were now under better control. She no longer sparkled for the sake of sparkling, or alluded for the sake of allusion. In fact, she must have had a pretty clear notion of the audience she was addressing and of its needs.

It was not an altogether different audience from her older one; but it was wider, more various. The novelist, like the playwright, must, if he expects to command a satisfactory hearing, appeal, in some sense, to the mass as an individual. What Mr. A. B. Walkley has said of the theatre audience applies, roughly, to what may be called the magazine audience. The element of physical contact and contagion is lacking; but the constituency of the news-stands does somehow pull together as one man. "A crowd," Mr. Walkley says, "forms a new entity, with a mind and character of its own; it differs from the individuals composing it, just as our bodies are unlike the cells of which they are made up, or just as a chemical combination is unlike its separate ingredients."

Before "The House of Mirth" Mrs. Wharton had not set herself seriously to the task of captivating the magazine audience. She had tickled its ears with her clever wisps of satire and badinage. She had gone over its head entirely with "The Valley of Decision," and the books on Italy which followed. Now, at one stroke, she succeeded in rousing it to excited attention with the "House of Mirth." Not that Mrs. Wharton abased herself to the magazine manner. Her style was as finished and urbane as ever. But at last its refinement was felt to be in keeping with the theme. Here, in elegant black and white, were the superior beings to whom democracy had hitherto been able to award only the humbler tributes of the society column and Town Topics.

The tale of Lily Bart could have been justified only as lifted to the plane of tragedy. In Mrs. Wharton's hands, adroit as they are, it remained sordid and vulgar. Something might have been done with it in the way of uncompromising realism; so, at least, a negative force and meaning might have been given to it. But in attempting to employ the machinery of tragic romance, Mrs. Wharton attempted the impossible. Lily is not a tragic figure, but a feeble and paltry one. Such glamour as she has is the meretricious glamour of social position; and this is true of all her "set."

Perhaps Mrs. Wharton felt the irony of Lily's fame. No doubt she was annoyed by the persistent attempts to give a local habitation and a name to each of her imaginary figures of New York. That was her penalty for not having made them also imaginative. At all events, in "Madame de Treymes" she withdrew to a safer and sounder field. Here, as in "Sanctuary," she challenged the closest comparison with Miss Anne Douglas Sedgwick (who, then irreproachable, has since gained popularity with "Tante"). A delicate study of old-world life on a comparatively small scale, "Madame de Treymes" went its quiet way. But in "The Fruit of the Tree" Mrs. Wharton again made, to speak coarsely, a hit. It was not precisely the same kind of hit as that which she had scored in "The House of Mirth." It lacked two elements of popular appeal which had counted in the earlier novel. It did not paint the society of our dreams—that of New York and environs—and it did not turn upon a problem of sex. But there was a problem—and it interested the public because it was a problem which everybody has attacked, however casually, and nobody has solved: is it right, under any circumstance, to put a human being "out of misery"? Unluckily, this is even less approachably a "well-made" novel than "The House of Mirth." Its six hundred odd pages contain material for two distinct novels—or perhaps we should say for a dozen short stories. And, as in "The House of Mirth," its material was presented with nothing more than cleverness—without the transforming touch of imagination.

In "The Custom of the Country,"* we are told, Mrs. Wharton has returned to the field of "The House of Mirth." We do not find this to be literally true. The heroine of this story is not a Lily Bart, but an Undine Spragg, of Apex City, Arizona. We find her in New York, to be sure, bent upon breaking in among the best people. In fact, when we meet her she has been there two years, with her attendant parents, and has not yet broken in. But she is on the eve of it. In a Bohemian circle to which she has penetrated, she meets a fashionable portrait-painter, Claud Walsingham Popple, and is much impressed with his fine presence and manners. Through him she meets, and is not impressed by, a real scion of the aristocracy, Ralph Marvell. He at once, without other excuse than her crude young beauty, falls in love with her; and as soon as she realizes that he is "the real thing," she succumbs.

Now, Undine Spragg is not a new type. We have met her recently in many novels—in Mr. Herrick's "One Woman's Story," in Mr. Dreiser, in the recent "Joan Thursday" of Mr. Louis Joseph Vance; in fact, wherever among our novelists realism continues to rear its head. She is the daughter of the plain people, forging towards success and happiness in the fashionable sense of the terms. The thing that is hard to pardon in her is that she appears a caricature instead of a refinement of that type. Undine Spragg is as hard, as vulgar, as calculating, as selfish as any professional daughter of pleasure could be. That she is physically cold does not prevent her being twice divorced in pursuit of the main chance, and finally falling back upon her first husband, because he is not only a multi-millionaire, but the only person who understands her. They are unmistakably a pair.

There is nothing to attach the deeper sympathies of the reader to this person or to any other in the book. Paul Marvell, who dies by his own hand, is well out of it, and that is all we feel: with his elegance and sensitiveness, he shows the futility that besets most of Mrs. Wharton's finer-grained male Americans. The Count de Trézac, who succeeds him, is of similar type, except for the fact that "the custom of the country," with him, makes the family of more importance than the wife, and so stiffens his backbone against her encroachments. Most of the other figures in the book are caricatured, from the masseuse and manicure artist, Mrs. Heeny, to the unspeakable Van Degen.

With all its amenity of manner, "The Custom of the Country" has a sharply satirical tone. The heroine is a mere monster of vulgarity; and Mrs. Wharton seems to feel a ruthless satisfaction in exposing her in all her enormity. The result is a defeat of what should have been the main purpose, to interest us in the Spragg. A caricature does not remain interesting to the length of six hundred pages. And there is no use trying to convey on paper the charm of a physical beauty which has no backing in mind or character. The mood of satire seems to be growing upon Mrs. Wharton, a dubious sign in a writer who has passed a certain age. It is hard to feel that, clever and effective and varied as her work has been, and is, she has ever yet veritably "found herself"—the self of assured power which seemed to exist potentially in her first books. Ten years ago, a stranger asking an American who was the most distinguished of our novelists would very likely have heard the name of Mrs. Wharton. It is not altogether due to the fact that other (potential) giants have arisen among us, that the answer would now hardly be the same.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

The Washington Benevolent Society, hitherto almost unknown to history, was represented by a nearly complete collection of its publications at a sale at the Anderson Galleries on October 28.

Benson J. Lossing, in the "Cyclopædia of United States History," notes the existence of this Society in a few short paragraphs, and erroneously places the date of its organization in 1812. His account is copied in other works of reference. That the Society was founded in 1808 is clearly established by the first number of the above collection: "Washington's Farewell Address, to the People of the United States, Published for the Washington Benevolent Society. New York: Printed by J. Seymour, at Washington's Head, No. 118 Pearl-Street, 1808." On a fly-leaf is printed and written the following certificate of membership:

This certifies that Augustus Fleming has been regularly admitted a Member of the "Washington Benevolent Society," instituted in the City of New York, on the 12th day of July, 1808.

New York, 24th Nov., 1808.
Isaac Sebring, President.
G. C. Verplanck, Secretary.

Organized by the Federal party to promote the principles of Washington as set forth in his "Farewell Address," the Society soon began to exert a potent influence on the people. During the first four years branches were established in nearly every town and village of the North and East, and copies of the "Farewell Address" were presented to each member. It made "peace" its constant watchword and, until hostilities actually commenced in 1812, used every effort to avoid the approaching struggle. Even after war was declared many of the "peace at any price" adherents were found among its members. Each member was required to sign the Constitution and the following declaration:

We, each of us, do hereby declare, that we are firmly attached to the Constitution of the United States and to that of . . . [State] . . .; to the principles of a free republican government, and to those which regulated the public conduct of George Washington; that we will each of us, to the best of our ability, aid, and, so far as may be consistent with our religious principles respectively, preserve the rights and liberties of our country against all foreign and domestic violence, fraud, and usurpation, and that, as members of the Washington Benevolent Society, we will in all things comply with its regulations, support its principles, and enforce its views.

An oration delivered before the Society at Boston, by Josiah Quincy, emphasized their opposition to the party in power:

Our rulers—who are they, and what is true of them? Mr. Madison is President, Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State; Mr. Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Armstrong, Secretary of War. Every man of them in Washington's day, the enemy of his policy. All of them laid the foundations of their present elevation on the ruin of his influence, and that of his selected friends.

The publications of the Washington Benevolent Society are of special interest, not only for the many rare imprints found in the collection, but for the great variety of Washington portraits, there being no less than fourteen different examples, some by unknown artists and engravers. The certificates issued with the volumes are of importance, as each was signed by the president and secretary of the local branch from which it was issued, men, in some cases, of national prominence. Troy, N. Y., appears to have been the next to issue a "Farewell Address," David Carlisle having published it in 1810. Hudson, N. Y., followed in 1811, with the certificate signed by Reuben Folger and William Hudson. In another Hudson copy the certificate is for the County of Berkshire, Town of Stockbridge, and is signed by John W. Hulbert, Henry Brown, and James Ball.

The year 1812 shows the greatest number of issues, the collection containing copies from Boston, Mass., printed by Buckingham, signed by William Stedman and Daniel Waldo (prominent clergyman); Greenfield, Mass., printed by Denio & Phelps; Hudson, N. Y., printed by Norman; New Brunswick, N. J., Lewis Deare, printer; Springfield, Mass., Thomas Dickman, printer, signed by John Hooker and Edmund Bliss; Troy, N. Y., printed by Henry Stockwell; another edition from Troy, printed by Parker and Bliss; Windsor, printed by Pomroy; Brookfield, Albany, and Trenton. In 1813 there were issues from Hartford, Hudson, New Brunswick, Springfield, and Worcester. The last "Address" issued by the Society appears to have been from Hartford, Conn., in 1814.

In addition to Washington's "Farewell Address" the Society published "The Text-Book of the Washington Benevolent Society; containing a Biography and Character of George Washington, his Farewell Address, and the Federal Constitution. Concord, George Hough, 1812"; orations by William Sullivan, John Pierpont, and Josiah Quincy; badges on which were printed the portrait of Washington; and a medal showing Benevolence crowning the bust of Washington.

Throughout the War of 1812 the Society opposed, as far as possible, the work of the Administration, but they accomplished much good by their benevolence, and Washington Hall, in Philadelphia, stands as a record of their achievement. With the demise of the Federal party during Monroe's Administration, the Society disappeared, its various branches being either amalgamated with other local organizations or dissolved.

GETTING THE BEST OUT OF THE BEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To get the best possible out of every human being—having regard to his endowment and environment—is a legitimate aim of economics, statesmanship, and education.

Look at the athletics in our colleges. They are organized upon an aristocratic system, to get the best out of the best. Skilled experts select from the entire student body those most richly endowed for their purposes in body, mind, and character. They then train them most carefully, and shower upon them all the advantages that money, time, and skill can give. The élite are now exercised, fed, and rested, then bathed, oiled, and rubbed, and sent off to Atlantic City or the Northern woods, as the highest judgment dictates. This exemplifies a principle in aristocracy—developing the best-trained powers of the best for the advantage of the race, and not fretting too much about the common crowd, but leaving it to take as much as it will out of the rich opportunities offered by the system at large. As a matter of fact, many think our athletics too aristocratically conducted, in that they do not afford out of their large receipts adequate facilities of grounds, buildings, and equipments for the participation of the commonalty in the sports so highly fostered.

I think this is the method of all the student activities at our colleges—athletics of every kind, drama, journalism, music, societies for literature and debate, or fraternities for social advantage. Nor can it be said that the system fails. All that look on, as well as all that take part, seem to agree that the best men for the purposes in view are found, trained to the highest point, and adapted to the objects in view.

But look at our education of the mind. In almost any educational convention, proposals to grade men in classes by merit rather than by age or alphabetized names, and to carry forward the superior men faster and further than their fellows, are quickly rejected as hostile to democracy and to the "American spirit"—in short, as "un-American." There is an implied theory—a kind of pseudo-democratic argument—which wishes to assume an "average mind" for all men of a given age, with an ability in everybody to reach the same standard, and even in the same time, if only the best teaching and training are employed.

It should seem to accord better with nature and science to find some way of separating, in each line of effort, those best equipped, most fond of the subject, most ready to work, from those who are less good or least good in these respects. An illustration may, perhaps, be found in the English system of university study and degrees, and again in the German system of treating the very youngest in their early classes at school. It was about 1809 that Oxford and Cambridge Universities in England discovered that the number of students relatively rich in purse but slow in mind, or unprepared, or indifferent to study was so greatly and rapidly increasing in the universities as to hold back in the several schools the highest training of the best endowed and most willing students. They did not see how to shut their doors against young men of means, though of small intellect and interest in study, who wished to devote such years of life to academic culture, even if the result of that culture was to be small; so they determined to separate the slow men and those willing to be satisfied with a minimum or "pass" degree, that is, with half-way excellence, from the eager, industrious, and able students who were ambitious of high honors. Thus were established the two sets of schools—the pass and the honors; and the system has been used from that day to this with general approval.

The present writer has no desire—he finds no one that has the desire—to diminish seriously the play of athletics or of other wholesome student activities. Athletics have done much, unquestionably, of good, not only for health of body and mind, but for good morals and vigorous qualities of heart and character, and the other activities have contributed to culture and to happiness. But is there any reason why—following the example of such student interests—the separation should not be made of those who make only moderate advance in higher education and those who are able to reach the utmost proficiency in specialized mental and professional work? The interests of both may, we think, be fully served together. And this recognition of intellect in turn would diminish any excesses of athletics or other student activities, and tend to restore to right limits and due prominence all interests together.

In the athletic world we see that the entire student body and the community at large are quite sure that the athletic system by its aristocratic principle has succeeded in picking out the best material and training it to the highest proficiency. They are also satisfied that the majority of low grade have every opportunity, and they worry no more about them. The university initial on a student's breast is accepted as marking first-class or highest excellence in the field of athletic endeavor. But is there any equally conclusive judgment in regard to mental results? Does the student body, or the student press, or the press of the community and the thoughtful public at large, know or recognize a corresponding and supreme distinction in the intellectual training and prowess of our "best"? One rarely meets such recognition in the talk of college students. Cum laude or summa cum laude goes for little with them. I hear them object that some such honor is awarded for the work of a single term; that the course was a narrow, specialized course; that the professor made the syllabus which the student had merely to commit to memory; that the professor made out the examination questions for his own course and perhaps marked the answer books himself; and then there comes a shrugging of the shoulders. Now in England the honor courses run two and three years, without an examination counting for the degree—in itself a test and guarantee of mental power—upon a single subject or a group of kindred subjects worked into a broad unity. At the conclusion of a course the students have a considerable series of written papers and supplementary oral examinations at the hands of a highly expert examining body, made up of men who have never taught the candidates or known them.

When a verdict is reached and judgment pronounced, the names of the first class, out of the four classes into which the honor candidates are graded, are accepted by the whole student body, by the press, and the community as representing men of first-rate, tried, and tested minds, as sure to succeed in mental aims in the world as the great athletes in the physical. And material emolument and desirable positions in a life career are at once put before them.

We cannot safely ignore the inequalities in man. Let the athletics take on more democracy for the physical training of the multitude, and let the real academics take on some aristocracy for the careful production of superior minds, educated to the highest point. Is not the best real progress always based on balanced combination and interlocking of these two great principles of humanity? Let us have "Pass" and "Class" in our colleges.

A GRIEVANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am disappointed and aggrieved at the attitude which the Nation sees fit to assume towards the governmental action of the past few months.

I subscribed for your journal on the assurance of New York friends of mine that it was independent in politics, conservative in principle, and devoted to the interests of civil service reform. Yet I find it supporting a President who in eight short months has shown more radicalism of spirit than was ever made manifest by any other of the country's Chief Magistrates in his whole term of office; who in his appointments has been guided by political expediency rather than inherent fitness; and whose methods in "driving" the Congress are more drastic than those employed by another incumbent whose course in this (and other) respects the Nation can hardly find language strong enough to condemn.

I find your columns silent—or feeble—in face of a Currency bill which threatens our gold standard, and a clause in the Tariff bill which recklessly and shamelessly sets at naught the principle of civil service reform; while your latest issue makes cheerful prophecy of the beneficent results of this same Tariff bill, one of whose leading provisions is the establishment of an income tax which is as flagrant an instance of class legislation as has ever darkened a country's history.

Your journal has thus given proof of being in effect only a party organ like many another which receives scant courtesy at your hands, and in my judgment differs from these other Democratic papers only in the grandiloquence of its professions, and the excellence (which it still maintains) of its literary style.

MR. BAKER AND "AN ELASTIC CURRENCY."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Herbert L. Baker, in a letter to the Nation for October 16, seems to have hit upon an important discovery. This discovery is that "an elastic currency" is "a contradiction in terms—a vicious absurdity," "a manifest impossibility," etc. Now we would first premise that when a phrase of this kind has gained a firm foothold in the language, has become a part of the established vocabulary of all literature on the subject, prudence should dictate some caution in applying such harsh epithets to it. It must be performing some useful function, or all economists and writers on banking would not concur so universally in employing it.

We quite agree with Mr. Baker that stability is a prime requisite of any circulating medium, but stability of value or purchasing power, and not stability of volume. In order to preserve stability of value it may be, and often is, necessary to change the volume. I think he has confounded two very different kinds of increase in volume. One is a large increase in volume extending steadily over a period of years without regard to business needs for more money, as an irredeemable paper currency, or an increase in the output of the precious metals from mining. This may or may not be a question of banking. On the other hand, there is an increase in volume demanded by an increase in business operations which require more money for their management, money "to finance prosperity." A currency which expands in response to these needs, and does not go beyond them, is said to be "elastic." It maintains stability of value, does not destroy it, and the principle is recognized in every economic theory and banking system of modern times. Without it, whenever business becomes active, money gets "tight," and conditions at once arise which hinder the further progress of business. Business activities are constantly varying, and therefore the volume of money needed to carry them on should constantly vary. Otherwise the fluctuations in the value of money will be just in proportion to the rise and fall in demand for it. The only way to keep the value stable is to preserve a happy balance between supply and demand. An ideal currency is one which automatically expands and contracts, according to this law. Take the familiar instance of the South and West in late summer and autumn. There is an unusual demand for money to "move the crops," it being customary to pay wage-earners in cash. After this season less money is needed for ordinary business. Whenever business is active for any length of time over any considerable area there will be a similar need of money. A currency which readily expands and contracts to meet such needs is said to be "elastic."

The want of elasticity is the chief point of attack on our present national bank system. It is thought to procure this very feature, but by making United States bonds the sole basis of issue, it has been found in practice that instead of expanding and contracting their issues to meet the needs of business, the banks are influenced too much by the variation in the price of United States bonds. When there is an issue of bonds offering a good investment, they are gobbled up by the banks, and issued in the form of notes regardless of business needs for more or less money. The Aldrich act of 1908, suggested by the panic of 1907, was intended to remedy this defect by allowing banks to issue notes on other collateral, State, county, and municipal bonds, or even on personal endorsement, but it was coupled with other provisions which wellnigh defeated the aim of the bill. The intention of the Aldrich act conforms to the Canadian system, which is highly elastic and serviceable.

Elasticity is one of the chief aims in every currency system. It seems to have been attained in Europe by a centralized banking system, as the Bank of England, Bank of France, Reichsbank of Germany, all of which have almost exclusive power of issuing notes in their respective countries. Even Switzerland very recently has changed from the decentralized to the centralized system. It formed the keystone of Alexander Hamilton's financial system, and the adoption of such a system in our own country would be only in keeping with the trend of modern banking in all the most advanced commercial nations.

A QUERY ABOUT THE CURRENCY BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As I began to take your paper at its beginning in 1865, and have never since been without it, even during foreign journeys, you will not doubt my great enjoyment of it. One of the features introduced a few years ago which greatly interests me is the finance department. Just now I am solicitous as to the effect of the new Currency bill; soon, I suppose, to become law in some shape.

I write to ask if you cannot give us some statement of your opinion as to the probable effect of two of the features of the law about which I feel some anxiety. These are the issuing of notes by the Government, instead of by the banks, and the apparent determination not to state squarely that the notes are redeemable in gold.

CHAS. A. BURDITT.

Boston, October 21.

[The Government, under the terms of the pending House bill, would not "issue" the new notes in any different sense from that under which it issues the present bank notes. The present law provides that a national bank, "upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States . . . of any bonds of the United States," "shall be entitled to receive from the Controller of the Currency circulating notes . . . equal in amount to the par value of the bonds" thus deposited. The pending House bill provides that "any Federal bank may, upon vote of its directors, make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided as it may deem best." The collateral (rediscounted notes and bills) is to be deposited with the agent of the Federal Reserve Board, who is chairman of the regional bank's directorate, just as United States bonds are now deposited with the Treasurer of the United States. The Federal reserve bank keeps in its vaults the prescribed money reserve against outstanding notes, and will naturally "take out circulation" (the phrase used of the present system) only as an individual bank requests it. In all this, the Government would have no part whatsoever, except to prepare and deliver the actual notes, as it does to-day, and to see that the security is kept good, as it does to-day. The Federal Reserve Board can put a limit on outstanding notes; it cannot increase them.

The provision that the notes "shall be redeemed in gold or lawful money on demand," is some improvement on the present law, under which, when national bank notes are sent to the United States Treasurer for redemption, "the same shall be redeemed in United States notes"; the 5 per cent. reserve kept by each bank with the Treasury, for redemption purposes, being "in lawful money of the United States." But the new law ought undoubtedly to stipulate gold alone. Evidently, some of the authors of the bill wished to do so; otherwise, why say "gold or lawful money"? The only gold in which redemption is possible would be ipso facto "lawful money."—ED. NATION.]

MIXED ENGLISH.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The following is from Gouverneur Morris's story in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

In a grove of hawthorns, kneeling, sitting upon her heels and contemplating her Oriental charms in a deep pool, he came suddenly upon the Princess Lo and her little green monkey.

I have tried to visualize the hero in the act of sitting upon the princess's heels, but must admit that my imagination is too feeble to paint the scene. Why did he not sit upon his own heels? Then again, if he was sitting upon her heels, how could he suddenly come upon her? Or can it be that she sat upon her own heels, contemplated her Oriental charms, and he did the sudden-coming? If it is this that Mr. Morris intended to say, he certainly did not succeed in the sentence quoted.

One wonders what has become of our respect for our mother tongue when one comes upon such monstrosities of English in a fairly representative magazine. If our writers exercised a little care in the preparation of their manuscripts such instances of bad grammar would not find their way into print. For surely a writer of Mr. Morris's standing has a better knowledge of grammar than he exhibits in this specimen. My professor of Latin was accustomed to say: "To abuse the English language is as immoral as to steal sheep." I am half inclined to think he was right.

DANTE'S PHILOSOPHY.

Dante and Aquinas: Being the Substance of the Jowett Lectures of 1911. By Philip H. Wicksteed. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2 net.

"I think it may be said without due sacrifice to the love of antithesis that Aquinas regards the whole range of human experiences and activities as the collecting ground for illustrations of Christian truth, and Dante regards Christian truth as the interpreting and inspiring force that makes all human life live." Mr. Wicksteed's lucid and suggestive book is the development of this antithesis. He leaves us persuaded of its essential truth, although at times his greater sympathy with the poet may render him not quite fair to the ecclesiastic.

For Dante "Christian truth" is, on the whole, authoritatively defined by Aquinas, who had single-handed made "warp and woof of a single web" the body of dogmatic belief accepted by the Church and the newly recovered philosophy of Aristotle. But Aristotle's doctrines had been as profoundly transformed by the Arabian philosophers as Christ's teachings by the Church Fathers. Each had, in effect, been assimilated towards a Platonic, or Neo-Platonic, absolutism. Plato's "ideas" and Aristotle's "forms" had been rubbed into quasi-indistinguishableness. Aquinas had to bring into conformity with Christian revelation an already existent amalgamation of Plato and Aristotle. To understand his amalgamation, therefore, we must be made to understand that earlier one, which, in relation to the fundamental problem of Form and Matter, leads back in its turn to the beginnings of Greek thought. In three highly succinct chapters, accordingly, Mr. Wicksteed follows the gleam of this problem from Greece to Alexandria and Mesopotamia, and thence back again to Europe; and makes the intellectual journey fascinating, almost romantic.

As to the indebtedness of Dante to Aquinas, he deprecates the hunt for mere borrowings. "It is always more important to know what Dante does with an idea or a phrase than to know where he got it from." The emphasis marks his method. He illustrates, indeed, the influence of Aquinas over Dante from the "Vita Nuova" on, but he is more interested in the disciple's departures.

Indeed, in that very central issue of Form and Matter Dante, we are told, departs not only from the doctrine of Aquinas, but from that of the Church itself. One of Dante's conclusions is declared "philosophically heretical," but the saving qualification hardly seems justified. Dante, says Mr. Wicksteed, "repeatedly asserts or implies that there was a distinct creation of first matter as a pure potentiality." The principle accepted by the Christian Aristotelians and ratified by the Church was that "matter without form cannot exist." The antithesis appears absolute; and Mr. Wicksteed by no means stands alone in drawing it. But he frankly and convincingly points out the result. "It almost seems as if in departing from the teaching of Aquinas on form and matter at the first creation Dante had never related his own views on the subject to the general body of his thought, and fell into inconsistencies of which he was not himself aware" (p. 150). This is indeed "startling"—especially when we are reminded that it is the unique instance of loose thinking by Dante, and also that the issue was a fundamental one, and one to which he confesses he had given strenuous attention. It seems imperative, therefore, to reconsider the facts. Although no extended discussion is here possible, it may be permissible to raise a doubt as to the inevitableness of the supposed "heresy." Evidence that Dante rejected the established principle that "matter without form cannot exist" is summarized by Mr. Wicksteed as follows:

> . . . Dante tells us in the seventh canto of the "Paradiso" that the elements were informed by created power, though the matter which was informed was directly created by God. Accordingly, the elements will be dissolved and they endure but for a space, which is directly counter to the teaching of Aquinas at the end of the last book of the "Contra Gentiles," for example. Nor is this a casual expression of Dante's, for in "Paradiso," xxix, 34, we are told that "pure potentiality," which line 22 identifies with pure or formless matter, was separately created and occupied the centre of the universe. It would be impossible to conceive a sharper contradiction of the principle materia sine forma esse non potest (p. 147).

In fact, however, are we told that the elements shall cease to exist, shall revert (apparently) to "pure potentiality"? Beatrice puts into her disciple's mouth the words: "I see the water, I see the fire, the air, the earth, and all their combinations come to corruption and endure but little." She proceeds to distinguish between these as "creatures" mediately created and man immediately. But do the words put into Dante's human mouth—"come to corruption and endure but little"—mean what Mr. Wicksteed understands? Does a human being ever "see" the elements in themselves formally cease to exist? He does see them in perpetual flux and change, and this flux and change will cease when the heavens cease to be revolved; but the elements will eternally abide—each in its proper place. Indeed, Mr. Wicksteed elsewhere in the book seems to admit just this: "When the tale of saints is complete, and the whole cosmic process has achieved its work, the angelic powers will cease to revolve the heavens; the elements, no longer disturbed, will each find its perfect place of rest" (pp. 143-4). But how can they, if "they will be dissolved and they endure but a space"?

What Dante means by mediate, or secondary, creation is more sharply brought out in the second passage adduced. There Dante conceives the primary creative "ray," as, so to speak, tri-colored, symbolizing "pure act," "pure potentiality," and the mixture of both. In the plan of the universe, "pure act" held the highest place, "pure potentiality" the lowest, their mixture the middle. But Dante is careful immediately to contradict St. Jerome's opinion that a temporal interval occurred between the creation of the angels, who are "pure act," and the "other world," that into which "potentiality" enters. The angelic activity, therefore—i. e., the informing of the "first matter"—is simultaneous with the creation of the angels. The informing ray, transmitted through them, penetrated instantaneously throughout the whole lower universe. There was no smallest instant of time then when matter without form existed. Supposing this analysis to be correct, if Dante departed from the Christian Aristotelian notion at all, it was only to the extent of a distinction without a difference. His position is apparently like that of St. Augustine, and after summing up the latter, Mr. Wicksteed remarks: "But there is little real difference between Augustine and the schoolmen."

Another departure from Aquinas, according to Mr. Wicksteed, resulting in unresolved inconsistency, is Dante's conception of the true heaven as spaceless. How is that to be squared with his full acceptance of the resurrection of the material body? Verbally, indeed, there seems a puzzle! but Mr. Wicksteed himself might find a possible answer in his own words. "To Dante, if I understand him rightly," he says, "space is objective to us in our earthly state, but it is subjective to God, existing only as his thought" (p. 265). Now, in degree as the blessed become one with God, space will be subjective for them also; but such merging of the soul with God is never absolute, otherwise individuality would be lost, and personal immortality in the Christian sense impossible; so that in the degree of their blessedness spirits reunited to glorified bodies will largely transcend the limitations of space, but not entirely. In other words, the true heaven is not in itself spatial —that is, not for God; yet is spatial for its finite, though miraculously endowed, inhabitants. If we supplement Aquinas's logical acceptance of a spatial heaven by his doctrine of the miraculous gifts of the glorified body, we should arrive at a conclusion substantially similar.

Again, Mr. Wicksteed draws a sharp contrast between Dante and Aquinas in respect to their conceptions of hell. "Dante does not explain hell, though he informs it with a solemn meaning. Aquinas does not make it mean anything; but he explains it as included in the act by which God wills his own goodness" (p. 201). Doubtless Dante gives a greater dramatic significance to the infernal torments by making, symbolically, "the punishment fit the crime." His sinners get not only what they deserve, but what (without fully realizing it, we must admit) they chose. This point is well taken, but the point about explaining hell is less convincing. "Since he [Dante] has not explained it, we can treat it as a mystery. In the ineffable Presence we forget it, but we carry with us the insight we gained as we put the spirits to question 'in the deepest pool of the universe.' And when the thought of hell is drowned in the light of heaven, the transfigured experience of hell is absorbed into it" (p. 202). This seems rather ostrich-like: because a hateful thing is not looked at clearly, we forget its presence! But, in fact, Dante is far from slurring the explanation of hell. Over its gate is written: "Justice moved my High Maker; Divine Power made me, Wisdom Supreme, and Primal Love." No doubt Dante showed tact in letting it go at that; but, theologically speaking, can we treat his hell as a mystery? Is there not inescapably implied in the inscription, if not Aquinas's own explanation, another like unto it? Mr. Wicksteed seems to imply that Aquinas does wrong in attempting to justify the dogma to "the human reason and sense of fitness," but that is just Aquinas's business. He does the best he can, fully recognizing the fallibility of his human reason. Elsewhere Mr. Wicksteed indeed praises this combination of "unflinching honesty" and modesty (p. 112).

Whether or not Dante ever really stepped outside the Aquinian theology, he certainly moved most freely within it. His dramatic needs led him to endow his angels and spirits with bodies, human-like though aerial. It seems a bold invention, yet logical justification lay in Aquinas himself, who had suggested that the waxen images, by injuring which witches injured their real victims, might be regarded as vicarious bodies of the latter united to them by a bond analogous to the bond (alligatio) between soul and body, but temporary. Or by logical extension again Dante notably enriches Aquinas's doctrine of the Atonement, itself developed from Anselm. Urging that not only must all human nature have been represented in the Atoner, but that the act of atonement must also have been sanctioned by the authorized representative of all humanity, Dante finds in Pilate, representative of the universal Roman Empire and Roman Law, the instrument preordained for that supreme act of justice. Thus the central doctrine of the Christian faith is made to give "the ultimate rationale of the temporal as well as the spiritual evolution of history," and is fittingly expounded to Dante by the emparadised Roman Emperor and lawgiver, Justinian.

This bold and apparently original synthesis has a further significance. It is the theological climax "of Dante's persistent attempt to draw the secular life into fuller and worthier partnership with the spiritual." An interesting phase of the same attempt is the Dantesque Purgatory. For Aquinas "purgatory is a sort of cavern in the bowels of the earth, in the purlieus of hell"; for Dante it is "a sunlit hill rising out of mid-ocean at the exact antipodes of Jerusalem," and crowned by the Garden of Eden. Aquinas also (although Mr. Wicksteed does not note this fact) conceives Eden as situated on the summit of an island mountain; Dante in effect transfers purgatory to its empty slopes, probably, as Mr. E. G. Gardner has shown in his recent book, "Dante and the Mystics," taking the hint from Hugh of St. Victor. But through thus making Eden, or the state of innocence, the goal of purgatorial experience Dante is able to give an entirely new significance to that experience. By the guidance of Reason, symbolized by Virgil, and through the gift of Grace, mankind may reach again that perfect harmony with God which for some six hours Adam and Eve enjoyed before the Fall. As truly on earth as in heaven is there a paradise to be regained. When the Veltro shall have come to drive away the Wolf of Greed from the hearts of men, each shall be "crowned and mitred" over himself, and all in peace coöperate towards that perfect actualization of all human powers which, sanctified by faith, hope, and charity under the guidance of the Church purified, shall make this earth, as was intended in the beginning, a fit vestibule for the courts of heaven. This is Dante's most intimate message. Poet and theologian, he is most truly in the fullest Hebrew sense a prophet. Aquinas is unconcerned with any earthly and temporal paradise. He is only anxious to get souls from earth to heaven, from time to eternity, as expeditiously as possible. Only the pure in heart shall see God, and few indeed in this life achieve purity. Therefore, though one may repent in extremis, and be absolved, yet satisfaction to God remains to be given. Purgatory is appointed for payment of that satisfaction in the currency of pain. Taking this narrowly legal and punitive view, Aquinas might well set purgatory "in the purlieus of hell." Dante's Mount is truly sun-lit with present joy. There penitents are not resignedly "doing time, not working out fines imposed by an external judge, but eagerly embracing the merciful opportunity of cleansing their souls from the stains of earth and the past. The pain of the operation is not merely negligible, it is welcomed as a sign of thoroughness. Theirs is "an inner reversal," not, as with Aquinas, merely "an outward cancelling," of sin. And we may all climb that Mount—now and here.

This ethical contrast is probably Mr. Wicksteed's most valuable contribution, and most fully justifies the antithesis quoted at the beginning of this review. Thomist as he was, theologically speaking, Dante nevertheless gave an entire revaluation of human life on this earth, esteeming it indeed a preparation for a better life in the hereafter, but not merely that. He took the announcement of the angels—"On earth, peace to men of good will"—literally. This life is worth living—if men have the will to make it so. So saying, Dante parts company with Aquinas, to herald the Renaissance.

CURRENT FICTION.

By the Open Sea. By August Strindberg. Authorized translation by Ellie Schleussner. New York: B. W. Huebsch.

Axel Borg of the present story, a man in the thirties, has been appointed superintendent of fisheries on one of the small islands in the Stockholm Archipelago. Like Strindberg at that age, he is a prophet without honor, his achievements having won him distinction only in foreign countries. On the island he has to combat pigheadedness and ignorance, and is settling down with much self-pity to a long grind, when that creature whom he classifies as only a short remove from the child comes to cause further disturbance—a woman. For a time the uninitiated will suspect that a pretty love-story is making, but others will observe the scientific analysis which Borg applies to even his happiest moments. When Marie smiles it is, of course, because she is about to wheedle; when she objects to his cynicism she is superstitious. As a picture of the ordinary woman's mind the description shows undeniable keenness, but in denying the value of intangible emotions, the "faint alarms," in woman, the author falls into his usual error. The reader, if not the author, may sympathize with Marie when, even after her betrothal to Borg, she turns for a momentary flirtation with a newcomer. The relief at being with a normal person might partly account for the guilty length to which the affair went.

This is not a pretty story; it is not great, though the materials of greatness are present. The main impression which it makes is one of huge waste of precious matter; and the feeling grows, as Strindberg's works continue to appear, that only perversity deprived him of the possibility of real eminence.

Hagar. By Mary Johnston. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

Is there to be an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in behalf of woman's suffrage? Ellen Glasgow, Elizabeth Robins, and numerous others have written earnestly for the Cause, but the fire which they struck was not overwhelming. Miss Johnston has laid new hold on the situation, and if the state of growing girls is the slavery which she describes—why, it is slavery.

Miss Johnston understands the secret—part of the secret—of artistic exaggeration: it must be logical. Examining the plight of average women to-day, she concludes that their childhood could never have held the bright happy days which one is apt to recall. If as adults they are fettered, what must have been their state of servitude as children! Ergo—some will balk at that ergo—any pitiful case of hardship may pass as typical.

Hagar, a girl of twelve when the story opens, lives on the Ashendynes' traditional estate at Gilead Balm, in Virginia. Her father, ill-mated, dwells abroad, and her mother (from whom she has inherited her mental worth!) does not long survive the cramped circumstances imposed by her husband's parents. Hagar is thus left with the germ of self-enfranchisement all but extinguished. When she is found examining Darwin's "Descent of Man," she is severely punished; an honest love-affair at boarding-school brings upon her the thunderous wrath of her Colonel grandfather; when she wins a money prize for a story, she is told that in the South the idea of women writing is deprecated.

But when her father marries again—this time a rich widow—and provides that Hagar, now a girl of twenty or more, shall live in New York, her higher development begins. Following her interests there amounts to summarizing most of the large questions of the day—literature, for she has become a distinguished novelist; settlement work, Socialism, equal rights, judicial corruption, moral filth. The last-mentioned problem is lugged in in the form of a "damaged goods" episode. At last Hagar sees the world, while travelling with her father, who has been invalided by an accident and bereft of his second wife. When he, too, dies and leaves all to Hagar, the cause of suffrage is enriched by fifty thousand or so a year. This she makes plain to the man of her choice, a bridge-builder and a late-comer on the scene: "And you're aware that I shall work on through life for the fairer social order? And that, generally speaking, the Woman Movement has me for keeps?" And at this moment of calmest betrothal Hagar remembers another duty: "Her candid eyes continued to meet his. 'I wish a child. While it needs me and when it needs me, I shall be there.'" If from a horrid beginning she developed to this, what might she not have become with a fair show! is the inference.

The Way Home. By the Author of "The Inner Shrine" (Basil King). New York: Harper & Brothers.

This is a story of considerably greater dignity than its predecessors by the same author. It is still emotional, but it is less hectic, less clearly aimed at the facile responses of the gallery. The theme is as "timely" as that of Mr. Churchill's "Inside of the Cup"—and akin to it. What is modern life to do with religion—or without it? Both novelists have usurped the recognized license of the playwright in beginning with an assumption in itself slightly absurd. Mr. Churchill postulates a clergyman of naturally intellectual bent arriving at maturity without knowing anything about the modern view of dogma, and without having observed that many professing Christians are hypocrites. Problem: to enlighten him, and to suggest what a man so enlightened ought to make of himself and his world. Mr. King shows a young collegian, son of a clergyman, and destined for the church, suddenly throwing over religion as a feeble sham and determining to live for himself alone. Why? Because he suddenly perceives that Christians are selfish hypocrites. And how does he come to see this? Because the parish which has supported his worthy but unprogressive father for forty years ventures to see the need of new blood, and to make him pastor emeritus on a reduced salary!

If the reader can accept this situation, he will find it worked out with a good deal of force.

Sonnie-Boy's People. By James B. Connolly. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Most of the stories in this volume are of the type Mr. Connolly has accustomed us to expect. Some are distinctly better than others, but all of them make interesting reading. The title-story should be read last; it has a somewhat mawkish note, not in accordance with the virility of such companion-pieces as "In the Anchor Watch" and "The Last Passenger," the latter a story of the Titanic disaster, which stands out as a remarkable example of restraint in narration. "In the Anchor Watch" is a story of the navy, of husbands and wives parted for five long years and babies that grow up looking for fathers of the sort depicted in hust portraits, devoid of legs. Mr. Connolly knows his man-o'-war atmosphere, and one always enjoys such excursions under his guidance, save when he descends to slap-stick bathos as in "Killorin's Caribbean Days."

The Story of Waitstill Baxter. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

This story is not without its strokes of wit—like this reflection of a henpecked philosopher: "A tantrum once a year's an awful upsetting kind of thing, but a tantrum every twenty-four hours is jest part of the day's work." But, on the whole, this is less enlivening than other books from the same pen. We somehow miss the effect of graceful spontaneity, the secret of which we have always regarded as this author's own particular magic. It is not that Waitstill is an uncommonly serious-minded heroine, for her younger sister Patty is sufficiently volatile to offset any possible disappointment on that score. It is not that Deacon Baxter epitomizes all the meannesses that have ever been attributed to the down-cast Yankee. Stern, miserly fathers are familiar figures of comedy. But there are circumstances embodied in the story that do seriously militate against the success of the fairy-tale method.

The handicap of filial obligation under which Waitstill's lover labors is the result of a peculiar misfortune which separated his parents in his boyhood and left his mother mentally broken and wholly dependent upon him. The cause lay in a curious passage of local history—the strange heresies of one Jacob Cochrane, who raised with his preaching a great wave of religious fanaticism in the community, left the seeds of strange doctrines planted behind him, and even led some to forsake their homes and follow him as his disciples. Thinking of the story that might have been wrought upon this theme, we can have little appreciation to spare for the story before us. Nor would we allow that this is at all an injustice to the author's present performance, for although she has sketched in this arresting outline with the lightest possible strokes and a complete absence of sinister emphasis, she has still not succeeded in making it the inconspicuous background that a pretty picture requires. Nor, as we said before, has she herself been able in its presence to exercise her accustomed graces of execution.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

The Government of the Ottoman Empire in the Time of Suleiman the Magnificent. By Albert Howe Lybyer, Ph.D. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. $2.

Though provided with two rather sketchy introductory chapters, dealing with the Turkish Empire as a whole, the origin of the Ottoman Turks and their culture, and the countries and nations subdued by them, this book is essentially a monograph on the organization of the government in the time of Suleiman the Magnificent. This governmental organization was divided into two parts: what Dr. Lybyer calls the Ruling Institution, corresponding, as much as may be, to our State, and the Moslem Institution, with a similar correspondence to our Church. Five chapters are devoted to the former and only one to the latter.

Suleiman's reign, of almost half a century (1520-66), represents the complete development of the Ottoman ideal and its fullest success; and it is from his reign first that we have sufficiently detailed records to render possible the reconstruction of this most remarkable institution. The Ottoman Empire of Suleiman was an absolute despotism, ruling free Moslems and subject unbelievers by an army and a court of abducted and in general forcibly converted Christian slaves; a despotism in which wealth and rank were conferred by the Sultan, not on the free-born natives of the country, but on enslaved foreigners, a Moslem Empire in which free-born Moslem citizens were excluded from the opportunities of advancement in military and governmental careers. No more singular institution has ever been developed. Indeed, it seems incredible that a great state could have been created by such a means, and yet, in point of fact, in Suleiman's time the Ottoman Empire was probably better governed, better organized, and better educated than any part of Europe.

A certain number of Christian slaves were acquired each year by the Sultan as tribute, by capture or by purchase. By a careful system of training and education of body and of mind they were prepared for various functions: soldiers, constituting the kernel of the army (Janissaries and Spahis); officers, commanding the native levies; administrators, filling all the offices of state from grand vizier downward; personal attendants to the Sultan in all sorts of capacities. These slaves, however high they might rise, however great the wealth they might acquire, possessed no rights except such as were given to them personally by the Sultan, which, as they were all his slaves, still belonged to him. They could not hand down their rank or even their slaveship, if one may so put it, to their children. Made Moslems, the children born to them could not be slaves, but became part of the free Moslem citizenship of the empire. The free Moslem citizens held the offices of the church and, as law was part of the church, the offices of the law. The law, however, the great unchangeable traditional law of Islam, was theoretically greater than the Sultan, which, if he broke, he might be deposed. This was the Moslem Institution, as over against the Ruling Institution of the Sultan and his slaves (kullar).

The two institutions, each having the Sultan as its head, were thus in curious conflict. The well-being of the state depended upon the equilibrium of the two. Suleiman's reign represents the time when the Ruling Institution had been developed to its fullest power and the two conflicting elements were at equilibrium. Incidentally, the exposition of the system shows its inherent weakness. It had reached its climax in Suleiman's reign, in the same sense that French despotism reached its climax in the time of Louis XIV. The wealth, the splendor, the extravagance, the very conquests of Suleiman prepared the downfall of the system.

Of the later decay of the system the writer has little to say, as he has little to say, and that not altogether satisfactory, of its origin and development. In an appendix he seeks to compare, but with confessedly inadequate material, the government and the constitution of the contemporary and kindred Mogul Empire in India with the Ottoman Empire under Suleiman, a comparison which, if imperfect, is nevertheless extremely interesting.

This monograph is a development from Dr. Lybyer's thesis for the degree of doctor of philosophy at Harvard University. It gained the Toppan prize, as we are informed in the preface, and is now published as Volume XVIII in the Harvard Historical Studies. The author is professor of European history at Oberlin College. Because it deals with Turkey and Ottoman institutions, the work seems to have a special timeliness. In point of fact, however, the Ruling Institution, the slave despotism, here described, vanished long ago, the last remains of it having been abolished with the destruction of the Janissaries by Mahmud II, in 1826. At that time the Moslem Institution achieved its final predominance. By its attitude towards the Sheri, or sacred law, as a finality, incapable of progress or development, it has condemned itself, in spite of the great achievements of the past, to barrenness, decay, and death. It is the chapter dealing with the Moslem Institution which is timely, and it is the principles of that institution, as there set forth, which make those who would really like to see a reformation of the Turkish Empire despair. There seems no outlook, except a revolution which shall utterly overturn the system on which the Moslem Institution is founded.

Arbella Stuart: A Biography. By B. C. Hardy. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $4 net.

Princess and Queen of England: Life of Mary II. By Mary F. Sandars. New York: Duffield & Co. $4 net.

To the rapidly increasing mass of Stuart literature these two substantial volumes bring reinforcement. Each author, curiously and perhaps appropriately enough, has already made a trial flight in foreign, which is to say, French airs; the one in a biography of the Princess de Lamballe, the other—strange combination!—in studies of Balzac, Lauzun, and Louis XVIII. Each has now produced a thick volume of more than three hundred and fifty pages; and both have confessedly relied on the scholarly work of others for the bulk of their material. Moreover, both have written "sympathetically."

Many years ago Walter Bagehot described this sort of work with much truth and more humor. History, he wrote, whatever its uses in the abstract, is certainly of great use relatively and to literary men. Consider a man of that species. He sits beside a library fire with nice white paper, a good pen, a capital style—every means of saying everything, but nothing to say . . . one cannot always have original ideas. Every day cannot be an era; a train of speculation very often will not be found. . . . What a gain if something would happen! then one could describe it. Something has happened and that something is history. On this account, since a sedate Greek discovered this plan for a grave immortality, a series of accomplished men have seldom been found wanting to derive a literary capital from their active kindred.

Even supposing it has all been set forth before, all investigated, material exhausted, nothing new to tell; even so one need not hesitate, much less despair, for generations change, every quarter of a century or so a new buying public appears, always readier, apparently, to purchase a new book, whatever its quality, than to read an old one, however good.

All this is perhaps not wholly fair to the authors of these two volumes—but it is not wholly unfair. All, or nearly all, they have written has been said before, a good deal of it certainly as well if not so gracefully or sympathetically, nor embodied in such attractive form. One cannot but wonder whether if Miss Cooper, and in particular Mrs. Murray Smith, who did the research on Arbella Stuart, had not written, the present author of the unhappy Princess's life would ever have produced this or any similar book. From this standpoint Miss Sandars has more defence, for, though she has relied very largely on Doebner and Kraemer and Countess Bentinck, Klopp, Macaulay, and others less known, she has been fortunate enough to have access to unpublished correspondence between Queen Mary and Lady Bathurst. This, though it adds little that is new or important, has some interest and affords corroborative evidence of matters known hitherto only from Dutch sources, while her book has the additional interest of reproductions from contemporary prints and portraits in private collections, as well.

In short, what we have here is a more recent account of the Princess Arbella, superior only in form to its predecessor, and the fullest and best life of Queen Mary in English. For each we may return a measure of thanks, tempered by the reflection that there are two more sturdy volumes to be taken account of, and enlivened by one good anecdote—the command laid on the dramatist, Crone, to write a masque for the young Stuart princesses in the form of "a clean, decent, and inoffensive play on the story of a rape."

English Epic and Heroic Poetry. By W. Macneile Dixon. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50 net.

"On the whole our scholars write better, and seem to keep closer to the work of art they study, than the Americans, who are prone to relapse, in protest against the glare of their popular style, into a decent and whity-brown academic diction." These rankling words may be found on page 137 of "Modern Studies," a substantial and stimulating volume put forth in 1907 by Oliver Elton, professor of English literature in the University of Liverpool. The sting of the comparison for American scholars may be mitigated but hardly removed by reference to the preceding paragraph in which our scientifically trained investigators are commended for their "clear and strict method, fresh digging, sober statement, and real progress."

These passages recurred to the reviewer's mind as he laid down the work of Professor Dixon (University of Glasgow) and considered how differently an American professor in good standing would have performed the task. From one of our men we should expect, in the first place, an elaborate classification of the "types" of epic and heroic poetry, and a rigorous subordination of the individual poet to the type. We should expect, also, a diligent—so far as possible, an exhaustive—discussion of the English and Continental sources and analogues of all the important specimens. We should expect to find the pages dense with dates and chronological problems and strange new names and titles of old forgotten poems, freshly dug from the grave of oblivion. We should expect our attention to be directed in an emphatic manner to the historical significance of this new material. We should not expect the author to betray any personal feeling, except that perhaps he might remark in passing that the death of Beowulf is "finer than anything in Homer." The result would be a "contribution to knowledge." We should not expect any one to read it. But it would be "invaluable as a work of reference." Perhaps, however, we ought to add that we do not think at this moment of any one of our men in good standing who would undertake to deal in this thoroughgoing scientific fashion with "Beowulf" and Spenser, Layamon and Cowley, Milton and Blackmore, Glover and William Morris.

In our academic sense, Professor Dixon's book is not notably "contributive." It utilizes some of the "spade work" of recent years, but gives little evidence of that "fresh digging" and "strict method" for which our men have been praised. It is quite readable from beginning to end, even when it treats of the great dead epic monsters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It is as much criticism as history, and it is written—let us quote Professor Elton again—in the recognition "that criticism is at last a fine art like friendship, and requires color and personality." It is, in brief, the sort of book that we do well to leave to our English friends across the water. For Professor Dixon's strength lies not in his curiosity and industry but in his taste and judgment. He is less interested in the evolution of genres than in the persistence of the spirit of poetry through all genres. He keeps close to the work that he is studying, asking of each: Is this poetry? What are its special virtues? How does it rank with other works of similar character? How does it stand the highest tests? Baptized and confirmed in the classic faith, moving through the highways and byways of English narrative verse, with the "Iliad" in his ear and in his heart, he constrains us through the whole course, from "Beowulf" to "Sohrab and Rustum," to keep in mind the form and feeling and style of the great classics.

Let us continue our thesis by illustration. We should not expect our scientific American student of the epic to divine that "The Faerie Queene" is "the fruit of solitude and long stretches of solitude," nor to call it a "picture-book of the spiritual life," nor to attempt any such characterization of it as follows:

> Knighthood is his theme. But while his contemporary, Cervantes, "smiled Spain's chivalry away," and noted with melancholy Castilian humor how remote and impossible its ideals had become in a world grown practical and materialistic, while the Italians, like Ariosto, viewed the old order as a man might view the games of children and consent to play them for the amusement of his leisure, Spenser believed the Middle Ages had seized, by a kind of divine instinct, upon a portion of eternal truth, surely divine and enduring. The ideals of chivalry he separated from the actual age that gave them birth, in which they had never, indeed, been more than counsels of perfection, and set forth the celestial pattern as a thing of unceasing worth. It is his peculiar, his crowning glory that he, beyond all other poets, or for that matter, philosophers, perceived the splendor of that immense structure of mediæval idealism, perceived beyond orders of knighthood, courts of love, crusades and quests and mysteries the true import of the visionary scheme.

Still less should we expect our "whity-brown" academic historian—supposing him to have seen the "crowning glory" of Spenser—to execute a critical return like this:

> Spenser is inconclusive. Nothing really happens in his poem, nothing is done. "The Faerie Queene" is like a labyrinthine flower, whose unfolding we can watch, or a liquid evening sky upon which, as we gaze, the magic rose appears, to glow and fade. If this be a national epic, it celebrates no national undertaking or achievement. No foundation is laid of city or state, no imperium established, no Ilion besieged, no Jerusalem captured. It would seem as if we had here a poem typical of the inconclusiveness of all romance, beginning nowhere and leading nowhere; it would seem as if the poetry of romance must logically end in a preference for the dream to the act; must, like the youthful Keats when he cried,
>
> Hence, pageant history, hence gilded cheat!
>
> look upon events as so far and no farther of interest or importance than as matter for the poet's vision. Then romance is parasitic and the antithesis of epic. For epic values the act, as drama values it, knowing that in the act, and not in the emotion which may accompany it, the prompting of the god appears.

The sustained interest of Professor

Dixon's work arises from the continuous presence in it of that un-American thing —an idea. We have seen how he applies it to the study of Spenser. Here are three other applications of it:

Take what side you prefer in such a debate, the infirmity of narrative poetry in the last century—who can be unaware of it?—is the infirmity which springs from the insistent, overwhelming presence of the artist in his work. Whether we take Byron or Keats, Tennyson or Browning, the reader never escapes the poet.

He [Scott] only in the century to which he belonged desired passionately and sincerely to display an age and a society rather than himself, and in his eagerness to revive it surrendered, as it were, consciousness of his own personality.

Who now among the poets puts himself to school with Milton? To-day we have with us the ritual of the soul and its sorrows—"the dialogue of the mind with itself has commenced"; we have the wistful speculation, the vague desire, the frail wayward charm, the delicate nuance, the dim halftones, "an exquisite faintness, une fadeur exquise." To the poésie intime they belong and you prefer them, le naïf, the strange, the subtle; you prefer the enchanted reverie.

You object that the beauty of "Paradise Lost" is outward, not shy, modest, sheltered, elusive, pensive. What you say, however, is true also of the Parthenon.

Diary: 1818-73. By Lady Frances Shelley. Edited by her Grandson, Richard Edgecombe. Vol. II. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50 net.

The second volume of Lady Shelley's diary is more interesting, in some ways, than the first. It is the journal of a mature woman who has not lost the enthusiasm of her girlhood, and who is daily thrown with some of the greatest persons of her time. The earlier volume, it will be recalled, was in large part a record of her devotion for the Duke of Wellington. Though happily married to an amiable man, the fervor of her feeling was for the hero of Waterloo. Much of the present volume is taken up with him also. For many years Lady Shelley could (and did) boast herself among his most intimate friends. Lady Wellington was impossible, and the Duke, if not quite a philanderer, was fond of pretty women, and depended on them for much. In the correspondence with the Duke here reprinted there are a hundred allusions to another married woman with whom the Duke's relation was even closer. She is spoken of as "the Tyrant"; the Duke complains, with somewhat heavy-handed facetiousness, of her exactions and her jealousy, and Lady Shelley pretends in turn to commiserate him, and to envy "la Tyranna." Lady Shelley survived her, but was destined to lose the Duke's friendship. The incident may fairly be called the tragedy of her life. The Duke had written a long and detailed letter on England's weakness in coast defence. The letter was addressed to a subordinate, and was intended to be confidential. The subordinate showed it to Lady Shelley, and she made the fatal mistake of fancying that the interests of the Duke and of the country would be served by widening the circle of its readers. The matter comes to the ears of the Duke, and he is furious. His letters to the poor lady are fairly brutal in their scorn and resentment, and no pleas for forgiveness move him. After some time his resentment seems to have cooled, but the intimacy was never resumed on the old footing. Nevertheless, as in her girlhood she had worshipped him as the greatest man that had ever lived, so on his death she laments him as the greatest and best of men.

Lady Shelley was not given to indiscriminate idol-worship. In the year 1819 there are some amusing entries about Sir Walter Scott, then famous as a poet, but hardly as yet suspected in connection with the Waverley novels. After dining with the Scotts she writes: "The only drawback to Scott's society is his wife, who is universally acknowledged to be the greatest bore in Europe. Scott himself speaks with a tiresome drawl. This gives a monotony to his voice which, like the drone of a bagpipe, provokes a yawn, even when one is amused by what he is narrating." Presently the conversation, which was general, turned on "Waverley" and the Scotch novels. "I ventured to say," writes the diarist on the following day, "that, in my opinion, their heroes and heroines are for the most part insipid, and that sufficient justice had not been done to the female characterization. Scott said that the fault was probably due to the author's fear of being charged with immorality; he therefore made his characters as blameless as possible."

The passage leads one to turn to Lockhart, where are several mentions of the Shelleys at about this date. Scott values Sir John for his knowledge of horseflesh (he was long famous on the turf), and—"I like his lady very much. She is perfectly feminine in her manners, has good sense, and plays divinely on the harp; besides all which, she shoots wild boars, and is the boldest horsewoman I ever saw." Of Shelley the poet, a cousin of Sir John's, Lady Shelley makes casual mention from time to time, but with no evidences of pride in him as a person or a poet. The great world in which the Shelleys moved was in another system than "young Bysshe Shelley's" world of dreams.

Half-Lengths. By the Right Hon. Georgo W. E. Russell. New York: Duffield & Co.

This is another volume in a series which opened with the admirable "Collections and Recollections" of fifteen years ago. Inexhaustible seem Mr. Russell's reminiscences, mingled with criticism, of British men and events during the nineteenth century. And no wonder; for Mr. Russell, a grandson of the Duke of Bedford and a grandnephew of Lord John, inherited two generations of memories, political and social traditions, and the great Whig gospel. To these he has himself added rich stores, derived partly from personal experience and partly from wide reading. In this volume he draws a contrast between Newman and Manning which reveals afresh the tragedy of Newman's disillusion and the truculence of Manning's curialized zeal. It would be difficult to quote a single passage in which Newman is more keenly analyzed than the following:

Newman was too much of an Idealist. He idealized the Calvinism in which he had been brought up, but soon found that it was hopelessly inadequate to the demands of the intellect and the broad facts of human life; and in his reaction from it he went perilously near the ways of thought which a few years later were stigmatized as Liberalism. When he adopted the Tractarian position, he idealized the Anglican Bishops; and the dissipation of that ideal by contact with Episcopal realities is the history of his submission to Rome. As a Roman Catholic he found even larger and more promising scope for Idealism, and disillusionments even profounder and more grievous. That to the end he idealized the Church of Rome—"the one oracle of truth and the one ark of salvation"—I cannot doubt, but he soon ceased to idealize Roman Bishops as he had before ceased to idealize their Anglican brethren; and to these must be added Cardinals, and Jesuits, and politicians, and editors, and, in short, all the agents by which the Church of Rome does its practical work.

Mr. Russell also contributes considerable sketches of the eighth Duke of Devonshire (Lord Hartington); of the first Lord Coleridge, "the most interesting" of the "great" men whom the author has known; and of Labouchere. The last is the freshest and most entertaining, and this sample note from Labby to Russell, when the latter was remonstrating against Truth's strictures on the Gladstone Administration in 1892, will show its quality:

My dear Russell—Never be drawn. Let a licentious and scurrilous Press say what it likes, and sit tight. . . . My radicalism goes to the utter destruction of the aristocracy. So, of course, I call attention to young patricians, and compare them with those children of the people, [H. P.] Cobb and [F. A.] Channing. This is involved in being on the side of destruction.

On these longer memoirs there follow fifteen "miniatures" of persons as unlike as the Duchess of Buccleuch and Adelaide Procter, Lord Kimberley, Henry Kingsley, and Baron Ferdinand Rothschild. Papers on Cambridge and Oxford, and slighter causeries on a dozen miscellaneous topics, complete the volume, which has, so far as monologues can have, much of the charm of mellow conversation.

Notes

On Friday of this week Putnams will bring out "The Lure of the Little Drum," a story of India by Margaret Peterson; "Collected Poems" of Grace Denio Litchfield, and as Volume VII of the work "A History of England," by various authors, "England Since Waterloo, 1815-1900," by J. A. R. Marriott.

"The Story of Helga," which has been translated by Adèle Lewisohn and will be published by Dutton in November, is by Rudolph Herzog, one of the most widely read novelists in Germany.

Macmillans have in preparation "The Stranger at the Gate," a novel by Mabel Osgood Wright.

Dr. I. M. Rubinow's "Social Insurance" will be issued the first of next month by Holt.

Among the books which Houghton Mifflin will have ready next week are the following: "A Life of Harrison Gray Otis," by Samuel Eliot Morison; "A Little Book of Modern Verse," edited by Miss Jessie B. Rittenhouse; "Hawthorne and his Publisher," by Caroline Ticknor; "The Greatest Books in the World," by Laura Spencer Portor; "Our Common Road," by Agnes Edwards, and "Personal Recollections of Vincent Van Gogh," written by his sister, Elisabeth Du Quesne Van Gogh, and translated by Katherine S. Dreier.

Mosher reprints include this season: "Songs of Adieu"; "The Growth of Love," by Robert Bridges; "Dreamthorp," by Alexander Smith; "Andromache," a play in three acts, by Gilbert Murray; "From the Upanishads," by Charles Johnston; "Songs from an Italian Garden," by A. Mary F. Robinson; "The Lyric Garland," and "The Pierrot of the Minute," a dramatic phantasy by Ernest Dowson.

On the day last week when the new group of buildings was dedicated at Princeton the University Press brought out a slender volume by Dean West on "The Graduate College of Princeton," in which the purpose of the resident graduate school is set forth with, as the subtitle properly adds, "some reflections on the humanizing of learning." Illustrations of Thomson College, Procter Hall, and the Cleveland Memorial Tower have been furnished by John P. Cuyler. It is an attractive memorial volume, but neither the Dean nor the Press should have allowed two wrong French accents on a single page.

The Oxford University Press has added to its cheaper editions the "Poems and Translations of Dante Gabriel Rossetti," including all his work in this field published between 1850 and 1870, and also the prose story, "Hand and Soul." As in all the volumes of the series the print is clear.

The Oxford Press has also taken over the Snowy River series, which was formerly issued by Penfield & Co., of Sydney, and Angus & Robertson, of London. Two of the Australian volumes that now come to us are "Hearts of Gold," by Will H. Ogilvie, and "The Poetical Works of Brunton Stephens."

A novel, interesting, and useful pamphlet has been prepared and published by Frances Ellis Sabin, head of the department of Latin in the Oak Park & River Forest Township High School, with the assistance of Loura B. Woodruff. It is called "The Relation of Latin to Practical Life," and is designed to show teachers how they may make "an exhibit which shall answer in concrete form the high-school boy's question, 'What's the use of Latin?'" To this end a large amount of information is brought together displaying the infinite ramifications of the classics in the languages and literatures and ways of thinking and acting of modern peoples. Together with this information, surprising in its variety, methods are given for presenting the matter graphically and pictorially to the doubting pupil. We commend the little handbook to those who are concerned in the question at issue.

"Education and Ethics" (Macmillan), by Emile Boutroux, translated by Fred Rothwell, consists of four lectures on the principal types of ethics and four on educational subjects, given at various times before the pupils of the Fontenay Training School for Teachers. Not precisely weighty, they are "familiar and homely chats" which reflect a delightful personality whose words are always inspiring and often impressive. Nothing could be finer than the author's repeated warning that the first duty of the teacher to the pupil is honesty. For him the embodiment of all dishonesty in education is—pedagogy. Pedagogy is a system of devices for stimulating the interest of the pupil upon false grounds. The only true ground is the intrinsic interest of the subject and its value to the child; and the genius of the teacher is shown in his ability to recommend his subjects upon precisely this ground. But no teacher can do this who is not master of his subject and who does not sincerely believe in the value of what he has to teach. So much for "The Motives of Study." The lecture on "Reading Aloud" is worth reading if only to appreciate the author's enthusiasm for the rhythmic beauties of his French tongue. Apart from this, it is an important lesson in the significance of style. The pedagogical theory of reading which is just now fashionable with us holds that the art of reading consists in the ability to cover the greatest space in the shortest time. This is "education for efficiency." To the victims of this desolating efficiency we recommend M. Boutroux on "Reading Aloud."

The second volume of "Cicero's Letters to Atticus" in the Loeb Classical Library (Macmillan) maintains the character of the first. The translation, by E. O. Winstedt, is on the whole satisfactory, though it cannot be said to succeed always in transferring the subtler qualities of the original, whether formal or familiar, to the English language. For example, the attempt to convey the familiarity of the clause, "qui illos libros devorasti" (p. 20), is manifest in the version, "you devourer of those books of mine," but the result does not indicate much feeling for English idiom. Such awkwardnesses, however, are not common enough to be very annoying. On the whole, Mr. Winstedt has shown a good deal of ingenuity in using French phrases for Cicero's Greek. But it is unfortunate that twice he should write à l'outrance for à outrance. The period embraced in this volume (Books vii to xi) carries us through the civil war between Pompey and Cæsar and the fall of the Republic. It would be ridiculous to try in such a note as this to characterize the letters themselves or to say anything of their marvellous exhibition of many phases of human character; but we may promise any one who has a remnant of Latin left that with this volume in his hand he may give himself such a treat as few things in literature can afford.

We have now the completed four volumes of the Loeb Library containing "Appian's Roman History" with the English translation by Mr. Horace White. A note conveys the information that the third and fourth volumes have been revised and prepared for the press by E. Iliff Robson, of Christ's College, Cambridge, but as the nature and amount of the revision are not indicated, we are justified in giving to Mr. White the credit for what is on the whole an admirable piece of work. Appian's Greek is ordinarily clear and straightforward, and these qualities have been well caught in the translation. The chief difficulty was to find English sentence forms equivalent to the piled-up participial phrases which are the curse of Greek in its later stage; in meeting this difficulty the translator has been eminently successful. We may commend Appian's vivid and human story of the Civil Wars as admirable parallel reading with Cicero's letters. But we cannot refrain from adding that in some details this edition of Appian calls for sharp criticism. The printing of the Greek is altogether too careless and has admitted a vexatious number of misprints. In this particular Appian has suffered more than any other Greek author in the Library with which we are familiar.

In another and even more important matter the volumes of Appian sin in company with their Greek companions. Let us say it without qualification, the typography and paper used in most of the Greek authors are detestable. For this we assume the general editor, Mr. T. E. Page, is to be blamed, unless we must carry the quest further, even to the generous patron of the enterprise. However that be, the person or persons responsible should know that the usefulness of these publications is seriously impaired by their form, for, after all, it is more important to keep one's eyes in one's head than to read Greek. One improvement is obviously needed and easily obtained. By including fewer pages in a volume a paper might be used which would permit of a clear impression. For example, the volume of Cicero now before us runs to 439 pages, whereas the fourth volume of Appian goes to 567. A better font of Greek type could be used (compare, for instance, the Loeb volumes with the Oxford texts), and better printing insisted on. If Mr. Heinemann, the responsible London publisher, cannot command better work, there are plenty of other publishers here, as well as in England, who would see that the manufacture was properly managed. If the flimsiness and poorness of the books are due to a need for economy, then the scope of the enterprise had better be reduced and the quality improved. The Latin volumes are notably more satisfactory in form than the Greek.

The subject of the monograph "The Life of Robert Toombs" (Macmillan), by Ulrich Bonnell Phillips, was an able and picturesque Georgian. He was born in 1810 and came to manhood just when his State was mad for State rights in connection with the Cherokee question. He disliked Jackson and became a Whig. He was a fluent and able debater and was well informed. He entered Congress in 1845, when the Wilmot proviso was about to open the last stage of the slavery controversy, and served until 1861. Like other Whigs, he opposed the early pro-slavery agitation and accepted the compromise of 1850; but he approved the Kansas-Nebraska act, joined the Democratic party in 1855, and followed the extreme Southerners as rapidly as could be expected from a man who had an unusual sense of his own dignity. He was mentioned for the Confederate Presidency, became Secretary of State, and resigned his office to be a brigadier-general. After the war he refused to ask for amnesty and died an unpardoned Confederate. To write a satisfactory life of such a man demands wide knowledge and scholarship. Professor Phillips has shown himself well fitted for the task. He is an authority on Georgia history; he has the scientific spirit, and he has the touch of an able historian. The book is an agreeable and valuable contribution to the history of the great sectional controversy.

Professor Phillips does not, however, undertake to discuss Toombs's shortcomings, and the distinguished Georgian had some deficiencies. His speeches, even those his biographer finds very able, are unpleasantly subjective. They abound in "I" and "we." They are always forceful and deal with many subjects, but they do not always show careful study of facts; e. g., the assertion (p. 149) that "the protective Whigs" desired "no more revenue than the economical wants of the government required, and in levying that revenue to discriminate for our infant industries." Toombs was too much of an individualist to work harmoniously with others. He could not be content as a Secretary of State to follow Jefferson Davis, and became a brigadier-general five months after he entered the Cabinet. As an army officer, he displayed ecurage on the battlefield, but he chafed in the intervals between battles and criticised the conduct of the war openly. He opposed the accepted policy of restricting cotton production and defied the execution of the law. When the war was over, he washed his hands of the problems of restoration and did not try to build up what he had done so much to destroy. Honest in public life, bold in uttering his views, he was nevertheless an egoist, and he had the shortcomings of an egoist. All this appears in Professor Phillips's excellent narrative, but the reader is left to find it for himself. Perhaps it would have been better if some careful balancing of good and bad characteristics had been made by the author.

Dr. William S. Stevens's recent work on "Industrial Combinations and Trusts" (Macmillan), though one of the least pretentious publications on that subject, is most useful. There is a refreshing absence of polemics, the author being obviously of the opinion that what the reader desires is facts. Dr. Stevens, in short, furnishes the Trust theorist with all the tools he needs and leaves him to use them in accordance with his common sense. By so doing he has earned the gratitude of busy persons, who are unable, by their own efforts, to keep their office and library filing cases adequately supplied with the proper records of industry, the enactments of legislation, and the decisions of courts. He provides us with typical pooling contracts, with the agreements on which certain representative Trusts were founded, with various enactments showing the character of legislative opposition to the Trust, and with citations indicating the nature of the judicial attack. All this, however, but faintly indicates the wealth of perfectly authenticated information. If anything has been said or done relative to the formation of Trusts or to the course which they should conceivably be made to follow in the future, the reader will be likely to find a record of it here. He will keep the book near at hand, in company with his dictionary, his Statesman's Year Book, his Poor's Manual, and other works of frequent reference.

In its Camden Third Series the Royal Historical Society continues to issue volumes of variety and interest relating to aspects of British history. Following the publication of the Register of John of Gaunt (Vol. XXI), two new volumes have appeared (Vols. XXII and XXIII, London, office of the Society), one containing the official diary of Lieut.-Gen. Adam Williamson, deputy lieutenant of the Tower, 1722-1747, and the other extracts from the archives of the Marquess of Bute relating to English merchants and the Spanish Inquisition in the Canaries during the years from 1586 to 1594. The value and novelty of the material thus rendered into print and the large number of similar inedited documents that are known to exist, awaiting publication, give to English history a special charm for the student. England has always excelled in the number of her serial publications established especially for the issue of manuscripts and edited texts. Among these serial issues that of the Camden Society, now for some years united with the Royal Historical Society, holds a high place. Its third series has reached the twenty-third volume and enough material is at present in the hands of editors to meet the demands of three or four years to come.

Gen. Williamson's diary has for a frontispiece the admirably clear drawing of the Tower and its liberties, made for the information of the Privy Council, by order of Lord Dartmouth, major-general of the Ordnance, between 1681 and 1689. The plan had already been reproduced by the Society of Antiquaries in the fourth volume of its well-known Vetusta Monumenta. The diary itself is of some importance for the career and idiosyncrasies of Williamson, who had served under Marlborough, and more for the history of the Tower, at a not unimportant period. It presents also a view of some contemporary events from a new point of view. In general, however, its value is rather antiquarian and biographical than historical, though in an appendix of notes, filling nearly half the volume, John Charles Fox, a master of the Supreme Court and the editor, has gathered a large mass of useful information and has printed many supplemental documents, chiefly relating to Jacobite movements and prisoners during the dates of the volume. The volume of "Canary Inquisitions" forms a kind of appendix to Lea's "History of the Inquisition of Spain," though only such parts of the Inquisition Records have been printed as concern English merchants during the period of the Spanish wars in Elizabeth's reign. The extracts are interesting not only from the religious but also from the commercial point of view, as affording an instance of the difficulty Governments have in repressing trade, when the general interest of the traders is against them. The text, in Spanish with an English translation, is of importance for the history of early English commercial ventures in Africa and the West Indies.

As illustrating the treasures of the muniment rooms of England, attention may be called to the report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission on Manuscripts in Various Collections, the latest volume of which, the eighth, has just come to hand (Wyman & Sons, volume seven not yet issued). In these volumes, the publication of which was begun in 1901, have been calendared the manuscripts of forty-two corporations, chapters, and private persons, all of which throw light, and some a flood of light, on phases of the history of England. The eighth volume contains calendars of the manuscripts of the Hon. Frederick Lindley Wood, M. L. S. Clements, Esq., and S. Philip Unwin, Esq. The first is particularly rich in the section dealing with the rebellion of 1745, forming an almost continuous narrative of events from the eve of Prestonpans to the morrow of Culloden. Though the papers do not modify or even materially add to our knowledge of the '45, they do furnish a number of fresh and interesting details and serve to correct sundry small misconceptions. The most interesting portion of the second series concerns the Irish and English Parliaments of Charles I, and includes a manuscript journal of the Irish House of Lords for the period 1640-1641, which contains a number of passages not to be found in the printed edition or elsewhere. The third series describes two diaries of a weaver, John Bufton, at Coggeshall in Essex, recounting events of the last half of the seventeenth century. The contents of the second diary, containing certain guild rules and other similar details, has been printed very nearly in full.

"Deck sports filled up another day. An extremely unpleasant young woman with a horse-laugh carried all before her, and once we saw three birds and a seal" (H. Frank Wallace's "The Big Game of Central and Western China," Duffield). When, in an opening chapter, one finds sentences and sentiments such as these, stylistic and personal prejudices tempt one to close the book. Mr. Wallace is unhappy in tact and in expression until he reaches the scene of his hunting grounds in central China. Here we cease to skip and find interesting facts and good diction. His description of a native Chinese hotel is excellent, though it can be fully appreciated only by those who have experienced its sights, endured its dirt, and sensed its odors. His enthusiastic eulogy of Hwashan, the flower mountain, makes good reading: "Wild thyme and sweet-scented, star-like jasmine perfumed the air, and on the emerald banks, little scarlet lilies made crimson spashes. Indian pinks nestled by the pathway, and over all lay the solemn, inspiring stillness of a mountain." The central purpose of the book is confined to a very few chapters, those relating directly to the big game. Of each group of animals we find an excellent summary of appearance, life, and habits, followed by a detailed account of the stalking and procuring of the game written in a manner to delight the hearts of all sportsmen. Among the more important of these wild creatures are such rare and interesting types as the takin, the Kansu wild sheep, and wapiti; the white-maned serow, Lord Bedford's roe-deer, and the Mongolian gazelle.

Eight takins, one of the least-known of large mammals, were in sight one day, three bulls, three cows, and two calves. Two of the bulls were sparring, while the calves were frisking among the rocks. A stalk was decided upon, and an hour and a half later the hunters reached the summit of the mountain, an altitude of eleven thousand or twelve thousand feet:

The ascent was very similar to the country over which we had already come. In the saddles, open grassy patches. Leaning on the stunted larches which bordered the edge of these little glades rested long roof poles and coffin boards, for the country swarmed with woodcutters. No tree was of any size, for in a country where fuel is precious, every large tree, with a happy disregard for the future, is chopped down and cast into the fire. Others are sliced into coffin boards and carried down the hillside on men's backs, and so by mule to Sian-fu. Replanting is unheard of, and to exemplify the deforestation of the hillsides, the first remark a Chinaman will make on seeing any well-timbered country which is new to him is, "Ah, there are some good roof poles!" or "What splendid coffin boards!" according as he is of an optimistic or a pessimistic turn of mind.

The remainder of the adventure deals with the actual stalk. The remarkable ability of the author to detach his mind from the excitement of slaughter of the animals to a comprehensive consideration of the environment is an example which a host of writers upon sport might follow. It gives to the volume an interest which holds almost any type of reader, while the careful, detailed observations of the animals themselves make the book a valuable addition to science—the new field-science which is so necessary now that mankind is so rapidly inheriting the earth and elbowing off the splendid beasts which have evolved with him through the ages. The pencil sketches of the author and many photographs round out these notes. A map clarifies the route and the position of the larger Chinese towns; three appendices treat respectively of field measurements, etc., estimate of expenses, and tables of distances and stages, while an excellent index facilitates instant reference to all the subjects of interest.

Brentano's has brought out in an edition uniform with the recently republished novel, "Spring Days," George Moore's "Impressions and Opinions," which made its first appearance in 1891. The author adds a couple of new articles and a preface, in which he suggests that the two volumes may now be laid "upon a satinwood table, while the reader dozes or lies back to consider whether he prefers our earlier to our later style." There can really be no question that "Hail and Farewell," the three-volume work on which he is now engaged, exhibits him in a more silken, clinging, stylistic garment than this early collection of criticisms. In compensation, "Impressions and Opinions" is addressed less exclusively to those who are enamoured with the supple personality of the writer and who share his languid disdain for all things English save the works of George Moore. In 1891, Moore was a young man, an aggressive æsthete, a hater of commerce and convention, charged with fresh memories of French art and letters, eager to make his mark, writing with something of the precision, vividness, and tang of Hazlitt finishing off Gifford or distilling the conversation of authors. His truculent assault upon "our dramatists and their literature" and his papers in behalf of a free theatre may still be relished. The articles on Balzac and Turgueneff show the insight and intense appreciation of a fellow novelist who has passionately studied these masters to steal the secret of their technical triumphs. But the prize pieces, we should say, are My Impressions of Zola, Meissonier and the Salon Julian, and Degas. Here, as distinguished from the filmy caricatures of "Hail and Farewell," we find an earnest and incisive definition of the talents in question, and full length portraits, drawn from the life, a little harshly outlined, perhaps, but brilliant, speaking, and permanent. Mr. Moore has put a sentence into his preface which he hopes we will quote—why not indulge him? When he was "sinking in a flood of public disfavor caused by 'Spring Days' . . . 'Impressions and Opinions,' like a big Newfoundland dog, dived after him and brought him to shore."

Members of the Gesellschaft für Typenkunde des XV. Jahrhunderts have recently received three very interesting issues, 1912: 3, and 1913: 1 and 2. The first named is accompanied by an index of Cologne printers, referring to type-facsimile sheets edited by Ernst Voulliéme and published in several earlier issues. (A separate title page for these sheets accompanied the double number 1912: 1-2.) The same issue, and 1913: 1, contain facsimile reproductions from Augsburg and Ulm printers, edited by Dr. Voulliéme, and of Leipzig printers, edited by Konrad Haebler, as well as of printers from smaller cities. 1913: 3 is exclusively the work of Victor Madsen, of Copenhagen, and gives specimens of the work of a number of Italian, chiefly Venetian, printers, from the collections in the Royal Library of Copenhagen. In addition to these regular publications, the Society this year has distributed among its members some original leaves from fragments of incunabula placed at its disposal for the purpose.

Reuben Gold Thwaites, writer, and lecturer on American history at the University of Wisconsin, died on Wednesday of last week at his home in Madison. He was born at Dorchester, Mass., in 1853, and received a common-school education. He took a course at Yale in post-graduate work in 1874, and received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Wisconsin in 1904. In 1886 he became secretary and superintendent of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin. For ten years he was managing editor of the Wisconsin State Journal. Among the books published by Mr. Thwaites are: "Down Historic Waterways," "The Story of Wisconsin," "The Colonies, 1492-1750," "On the Storied Ohio," and "Original Journals of Lewis and Clark." The work that gave him his chief note, however, was the editing of "The Jesuit Relations," in seventy-three volumes, a task which occupied five years (1896-1901) and which resulted in throwing a flood of new light upon early Western history. As editor of seventeen volumes of the Wisconsin Historical Collections, and head of the State Historical Library, he was responsible for a new Western interest in the amassing of historical data; while his connection with the University of Wisconsin enabled him to turn many scholars into the field.

The Hon. Emily Lawless, daughter of the late Baron Cloncurry, died last week in London, England. She was a writer of novels and verse. Born in Ireland, she lived at Hazelhatch, Gomshall, Surrey. Her published works include "Hurrish," "Major Lawrence, F.L.S.," "Plain Frances Mowbray," "With Essex in Ireland," "Grania," "Maelcho," "A Garden Diary," "With the Wild Geese," "Maria Edgeworth," and "The Book of Gilly."

Ludwig Max Goldberger, Commercial Privy Councillor and formerly president of the Permanent Exposition Commission, died last week in Berlin. He was the author of "The Land of Unlimited Possibilities," a book on contemporary American affairs. He was born at Tarnowitz, Silesia, in 1848.

Science

Mr. Abraham Flexner is at work on the second of the series of books which the Century Company is publishing for the Bureau of Social Hygiene. The volume deals with prostitution in Europe.

"The Constitution of Matter," by Prof. Josepb S. Ames, is announced for issue next week by Houghton Mifflin.

Wonderful progress made in the science of genetics during the last three years makes it almost obligatory for an author to rewrite a general treatise on the subject as presented in 1909. This Mr. William Bateson frankly admits in a note to the third impression, printed in 1913, of his book on "Mendel's Principles of Heredity" (Putnam). An effort is made to bring the subject up to date by the addition of some eighteen pages of notes to be used as appendixes to the several chapters, but the essential changes in point of view and general biological interpretations of the accumulated mass of details scarcely make the effort successful.

For many years Prof. Marcus Hartog, of University College at Cork, purposed writing a general treatise on reproduction suited for laymen having interest, but no technical training. Finding himself at last unable to complete such a work, he has made a compromise in a book entitled "Problems of Life and Reproduction" (Putnam). Here are brought together eleven essays which he had published in various journals and reviews, mostly in the past dozen years, but three of somewhat older date. There is considerable revision and annotation that the essays may include new discoveries. One on fertilization has been largely rewritten, and another extensively remodelled in order to bring out the author's doctrine of "mitokinetism" as the action of a new and peculiar force by which he conceives the phenomena of mitosis may be explained. Those who are interested in Hartog's views will be glad to have these papers collected in this handsome form, and others may read them with profit, but it is an occupation that for the most part may not be undertaken light-heartedly. There is an extraordinarily copious index.

"Vertebrate Embryology" (Frowde), by J. W. Jenkinson, is an effort to state the present view of a limited portion of the subject with abundant and often very excellent illustrations. It deals with the structure, origin, maturation, and fertilization of the germ cells, the mechanism of segmentation, and the formation of the germinal layers. The development of the embryo is followed only in the early stages, but with some explanatory extension, and for the purpose of giving a sound basis for the medical man, the detailed organogeny being reserved for a later volume. Much space, about a quarter of the book, is devoted to the fœtal membranes and to the placenta. American authorities are cited, but the reader is left with the impression that the author is not very familiar with the contributions from this side of the Atlantic.

Written as an obvious protest against the modern methods of teaching botany, F. L. Sargent's "Plants and Their Uses: An Introduction to Botany" (Holt) presents a curious and perhaps helpful point of view. The author begins with the assumption that the obvious and most interesting questions to ask about a plant are "What is it? What is it good for? or What does it do?" With these as a guiding principle, it follows that the work differs radically from any of the textbooks now in use. For it lays emphasis, not upon processes such as photosynthesis, respiration, reproduction, and so forth, but upon the plants that touch the every-day existence of all of us, such as the foods, beverages, drugs, fibres, and the like. The first half of the book is taken up with descriptions and historical notes upon the introduction into cultivation of all the better-known economic plants. The usual routine ground is covered, but tersely and with some haste, and the chief emphasis is laid on industrial botany, if there be such a science. It is unfortunate that the first modern textbook that approaches botany from this side should have inaccuracies of statement and a certain lack of perspective. For instance, opium is a narcotic, not an intoxicant (p. 184); the Para rubber tree is Hevea brasiliensis, not H. guyanensis (p. 281), and there is no mention of the Straits Settlements' great new rubber industry based on this Brazilian plant, no mention of the important Mexican rubber Castilla elastica; among the fibres, the sisal hemp, which has controlled the economic destiny of Yucatan, is not cited; and also the statement about the origin of peat and coal (p. 298) perpetuates a very general misconception that one might have expected the author to correct. These valuable fuels arise not by the accumulation in bogs of vegetable matter and its slow decomposition "in the presence of water," but by a partial decomposition, ultimately stopped by the water acting as a barrier to the oxygen of the air. A considerable part of the book is devoted to systematic botany, and this section is a distinctly disappointing feature. There seems to be no real attempt to clarify this phase of the subject, and, surprisingly enough, there is no mention of the sequence of plant families, now so generally adopted, based on the great work of Engler and Prantl. Also, pages 404 to 427 are rather needlessly taken up with a wholly original system of cabalistic characters, the written equivalents for which would have occupied scarcely more space, and have been immediately intelligible. The book is very carefully indexed and will undoubtedly fill a useful niche as a general work of interesting information about plants.

A welcome announcement of cartographic progress in Argentina is made in a recent publication of the official Geographical Military Institute, entitled "La Carte de la République Argentine," by Col. B. G. Aparicio (Buenos Ayres, 1913; 110 pages, many maps). The volume contains a scholarly review of work already accomplished, with a valuable list of all maps that have appeared and a useful bibliography of works on Argentina. Index maps are included to show the distribution of sheets in the proposed map of the republic on scales of 1:1,000,000 and 1:100,000. Samples of the proposed maps are included at the end of the book, from which it appears that the 1:100,000 sheets of the standard map will be printed with brown contours and hill shading, blue hydrography, and black roads, names, etc. The contour interval appears to vary in different districts, but will be at most 20 metres; hachures in black will indicate exceptionally strong slopes.

An echo of the Transcontinental Geographical Excursion of 1912 has lately appeared in the proceedings of a meeting held near the end of the excursion at the University of Virginia, under the auspices of the Philosophical Society of that University. The intention of the meeting was to promote the cultivation of geography as a subject of university study in the United States, and with that object addresses were made by Professors Partsch of Leipzig, Oberhummer of Vienna, Gallois of Paris, Chisholm of Edinburgh, and Chaix of Geneva, all of whom briefly described the status of geography in the universities of their respective countries. It was particularly appropriate that these addresses should be delivered at the University of Virginia and that they should now be published for extended distribution through the Southern States, for no college or university in that part of our country has yet recognized geography to the extent of making it the subject of a professorial appointment.

The death is reported from Baltimore of Dr. Philip Reese Uhler, a noted scientist and for many years provost of the Peabody Museum of that city. He was born in Baltimore in 1835. He had spent three years at Harvard as assistant to Prof. Louis Agassiz, and later was an associate in natural sciences at Johns Hopkins. Among the learned societies of which he was a member were the Royal Society of Arts, London, and the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences.

Just Lucas-Championnière, surgeon, died in Paris on Wednesday of last week while he was reading a paper on "Prehistoric Trepanning" before a committee of the Academy of Sciences. He was born in 1843, and was a member of the Academy of Medicine. His father was the founder of the Journal de médecine et de chirurgie. He himself was a member of the Académie de Médecine.

WILLIAM WINTER'S REMINISCENCES.

The Wallet of Time. By William Winter. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. Two volumes. $10 net.

In these two handsome and substantial volumes, comprising more than 1,350 pages, Mr. Winter gives a comprehensive survey of the American stage as he has known it during the period of nearly sixty years in which he has been actively engaged as a dramatic critic. No man living is better qualified by experience and ability for such a task, and this instalment of it—for the work is not yet completed—is notable for its literary quality and the fulness and accuracy of its detail. With the exception of Edwin Booth, Joseph Jefferson, and Richard Mansfield, of whom Mr. Winter has already published separate biographies; Henry Irving and Ellen Terry, upon whose lives he is now busy; and Lester Wallack, William Warren, W. E. Burton, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, and some others of lesser note who are to be considered in a sequel, all the more prominent players of the last half of the nineteenth century, who have appeared in this country, are dealt with in this book. The work is further enriched by miscellaneous essays on various aspects of the theatre, managerial developments and policies, the art of acting, the interpretation of famous characters, the modern social and sexual drama, and so forth, all of which are written with the vigor of intense conviction and an eloquence that charms even in those occasional instances where it may fail to convert.

In compiling this work Mr. Winter has not hesitated, as he tells in his preface, to make use of his earlier writings, many of which are now out of print. It is not likely that the revision of them cost him much trouble, for his attitude to the theatre has not changed in the lapse of years. Nor is he afraid of being called a laudator temporis acti. He knows, as all old playgoers know, that except in contemporaneous drama, the actors of preceding generations were more capable and more versatile than those of to-day, because in the old stock companies they had opportunities of improving their faculties which no longer exist. His denunciation, upon purely artistic and other grounds, of the present system of ignorant and conscienceless commercial management, is as sound as it is trenchant. The system has spelled ruin and disgrace for the theatre wherever it has prevailed. The only hope of a theatrical revival lies in the success of that revolt against its domination of which, happily, there are signs in many directions. And it is encouraging to find a man of his experience and authority speaking out so clearly and so boldly concerning the higher and most legitimate functions of the stage as a potential agent in the promotion of right standards in taste and ethics, and concerning the heavy responsibility that rests upon all—whether managers or critics—who connive at a profitable degradation of public morals. At the same time he is careful to explain that it is not the mission of the stage to be didactic, but, under the guise of honest and rational—not necessarily highly intellectual—entertainment, to suggest what is wholesome, good, or noble. Some strange reflections are aroused by his summary of the proper qualifications of a dramatic critic. There is undoubtedly a need for a few such paragons.

Not every reader will agree with all of Mr. Winter's estimates of the players whom he celebrates, but even those who differ from him will admire the analytical skill and descriptive power with which he supports his opinions. And his intimate acquaintance with the theatrical world enables him to flavor his biographies with the attractive spice of personal reminiscence. Thus he gives a most interesting account of the eccentricities of that great actor, Junius Brutus Booth. An admirable analysis of the Falstaff of Hackett, commonly accepted as one of the finest embodiments of the character ever given, furnishes another admirable chapter. His essay on Edwin Forrest, as man and actor, is a most striking bit of distinctive, yet judicious, criticism. "A vast animal bewildered by a grain of genius" is one of his felicitous phrases. On Charlotte Cushman he pens a glowing eulogy, and he pays a tribute of loving appreciation to that rare old artist, Mrs. G. H. Gilbert. The comic genius and remarkable versatility of John E. Owens receive a recognition as just as it is generous. He praises the romantic powers of Charles Fechter very highly, but disapproves strongly of his Hamlet, an impersonation which has been vastly admired by other competent authorities. It should be noted, however, that Fechter was in his decadence before he reached this country. Upon the splendid achievements of Salvini, in such parts as Conrad, Saul, Niger, and Ingomar, he bestows the most eloquent laudation; but towards the Shakespearean performances of the great Italian he is more than cool. That in these assumptions Salvini, who knew no English, and very little about British commentaries and traditions, departed widely, in form and spirit, from established conceptions, may be granted readily. His Hamlet, indisputably, was utterly un-Shakespearean, but his Othello, surely, was a masterpiece, at all events from his own point of view. In his broad contention that English actors are, almost of necessity, the best interpreters of English poetic masterpieces, Mr. Winter is on tolerably safe ground, if a possible exception be made in the case of the Germans; but there are exceptions to most rules, and there is no particular reason why an Italian, for instance, should not comprehend such parts as Othello and Coriolanus.

Two of the most notable chapters are those on Modjeska and Sarah Bernhardt. To the former he awards the highest rank as woman and actress, extolling especially her Adrienne, Camille, and Portia. He is more reserved in his praise of her Juliet, which he characterizes as too mature; her Viola, which he calls "finical, indefinite, and therefore abortive," and her Rosalind, in which he notes a deficiency of exuberant physical life. These will be hard sayings to many. To the present writer the Rosalind of the gifted Polish woman was the most poetic known to the modern stage, and, barring the broken English, perhaps the nearest to the Shakespearean ideal. In dealing with the career of Sarah Bernhardt, Mr. Winter is just, if severe. The most fervent worshippers of that remarkable woman could not ask for a more hearty recognition, than he accords, of her extraordinary histrionic talents and her mastery of technical resource; but he asserts, what is the inexorable fact, that her art, in the main, has been devoted to ignoble and pernicious ends, that she has never furnished a single study of chaste or exalted womanhood, and that there is no reason for supposing that she could do so. Moreover, she has not scrupled to seek profit in rank sensation and advertisement; and he argues that she has only succeeded in acquiring notoriety at the expense of permanent fame. Money, he remarks, is always to be made from incursions into the sewers.

Although he selects Bernhardt as a flagrant example of the harm done by purveyors of the modern feverish and unclean drama, he does not spare less conspicuous offenders. He berates some of his most esteemed performers for their traffic in such pestilent stuff, and he is especially energetic and caustically humorous in his castigation of the hypocrisy that, under the pretence of dramatizing literary masterpieces, extracts particular incidents for exhibition for the gratification of a vulgar taste. His comments upon certain specimens of the "advanced" English, French, German, and Scandinavian drama afford entertaining reading. Further reference to them, or to the many excellent biographies of which no mention has been made, is impossible at this time. The general nature and quality of the book have, perhaps, been sufficiently indicated. It is full of good things for the general reader as well as the theatrical enthusiast.

Augustus Thomas's latest play, "Indian Summer," produced in the Criterion Theatre on Monday evening, is of a rather disappointing character. The first two acts are in his very best manner, and constitute first-class comedy, but the third act degenerates into somewhat cheap and conventional melodrama, while the fourth is hazy and inconclusive. Those scenes which deal with the development of a romance between a middle-aged artist and a young girl, in whom he has found inspiration and rejuvenation, are wholly charming. They are written with fine feeling and imagination, they are clever studies in characterization, and are admirably acted by John Mason and Martha Hedman. The melodramatic incidents which temporarily threaten to keep the lovers apart are of wholly subordinate interest. Incidentally Mr. Thomas enters a plea for the charitable treatment of erring women by sisters who have not succumbed to temptation, or, perchance, have been less tempted. The first half of the piece was received with an enthusiasm which was not maintained during the later acts.

Winthrop Ames has opened the season of his Little Theatre with a production of the "Prunella" of Laurence Housman and Granville Barker, which was played originally, with marked success, under Mr. Barker's management in London. It is a piece of excellent literary quality, written partly in verse, containing an attractive mixture of quaint characterization, satirical humor, and pretty sentiment. Archaic in form and romantic in many of its details, it is completely modern in spirit. The theme of it is the peril that ignorance may bring to innocence, and the satire is directed against the old puritanical system of domestic education. Prunella is a little orphan maiden, daughter of a confiding mother and a vagabond artist, who has been reared in the strictest seclusion behind the walls of an old-world garden by three maiden aunts, Prim, Prude, and Privacy. She knows nothing of the world, or of evil, and has never seen a young man. Therefore, when Pierrot, the chief of a band of strolling players, comes by chance into her sanctuary, she regards him as a divinity, and, being persuaded to give him a kiss, in all simplicity, is made free of love's mysteries and is ready to follow him, as Pierrette, to the end of the world. Three years later, having been deserted, but still loving, she returns to find the old garden a ruin. Thither also presently comes Pierrot, satiated and morose after a life of selfish self-indulgence, and mourning Prunella, whom he supposes to be dead. His old roystering companions, types of vice and folly, try in vain to rally him. When his lost love reappears he takes her for a ghost, and when she holds out her arms to him, he believes that she is asking him to die. For her sake, being regenerated by the true love that has succeeded to the dead passion, he is even willing to do this, and, his sincerity being thus proved, the curtain falls upon a scene of reconciliation. This is the merest skeleton of a fable which is embellished by many strokes of happy fancy and some scenes of moving sentiment. The moral of it all seems to be conveyed in the discourse of an ancient gardener, admirably sketched, who explains that nature will overrun everything, if it be not kept within bounds by proper pruning. Fantastic as the piece is in its general structure, it is by no means devoid of realism or of genuine dramatic force, while the particular lesson which it inculcates is undeniably sound. But plainly, in the case of youth, too much knowledge of a certain kind may be as mischievous as excessive pruning. As a specimen of the literary and intellectual drama, however, "Prunella" is a welcome addition to our stage, and it is beautifully mounted and, on the whole, well acted at the Little Theatre, although the elocution, as is almost inevitable now in a poetic play, leaves much to be desired. The merit of some of the verse is greatly obscured.

Mr. F. R. Benson, the distinguished Shakespearean actor-manager, sends the following letter for publication:

I do not understand why at the moment I am undergoing a somewhat unenviable notoriety in stage journalism, as I have never given utterance to the expressions attributed to me concerning either the New York theatres or the New York public. In fact, I cannot remember having referred to them recently in any public lectures or press interviews. I have not had the pleasure of being much in New York, but I have passed three or four very pleasant evenings in its theatres, listening to the work of my fellow-craftsmen, and I should be loath to be put in a false position in their eyes. I have often said and still hold that it is hard for any large modern city to be a suitable nursery or cradle for art, because of the ugliness and inhumanity of modern cities as we know them to-day, not, as I believe, as we shall know them to-morrow.

It is pleasant to be assured that Mr. Benson has not been making impolite utterances about the New York theatres and the New York public, but what most persons interested in the theatre wish to know, and what this letter does not tell, is to what extent he is associated with the reported determination of the Stratford management not to permit the company of which he is the head to give the city a taste of its quality. New York may not be suitable for a nursery or cradle of infantile art, but it knows how to appreciate and reward the finished artist. It is incredible that Mr. Benson should be afraid of submitting his players to the test of criticism by audiences accustomed to the standards set by Edwin Booth, Salvini, Henry Irving, Ellen Terry, and Forbes-Robertson.

"Interlopers," having failed at the London Royalty, will be followed there soon by "The Pursuit of Pamela," a new comedy by C. B. Fernald. The heroine is a young lady, married at the early age of sixteen, who, in her flight from temptation, provokes the hero to a series of adventures extending to the furthest corners of the earth. The first act takes place in Honolulu, the second in Japan, the third in Hongkong, and the fourth in Canada. This lady is to be played by Gladys Cooper, lately appearing in "Diplomacy" at Wyndham's, where her place will be taken by Marie Doro. Dennis Eadie is to have an important part.

Charles Hallam Elton Brookfield, joint examiner and censor of plays, is dead in London. Mr. Brookfield, who was born in 1857, went on the stage in 1879, and until he retired, in 1889, he was associated with the Bancrofts, the Kendals, and Sir H. Beerbohm Tree. He played in almost everything from farce to Shakespeare. His appointment as joint censor with G. A. Redford was made on December 8, 1911. He wrote and produced nearly fifty plays, of which "Dear Old Charlie" was the most frequently mentioned at the time of his appointment.

Music

After twice hearing Elgar's new orchestral work, "Falstaff," Robin H. Legge, of the London Telegraph, could not make up his mind whether he quite liked it or not. He found in it "a vein of quaint humor, as when Falstaff sleeps; of rare beauty and charm, as in the interludes; and even more in the exquisite closing scene of the fall and death of Falstaff." The whole is "a masterpiece of music, prodigiously stamped with Elgar's own remarkable personality." But it is all extremely complicated, and much of it seemed so obscure that this critic concluded that the fault lay in the fact that Elgar, who conducted the novelty at the Leeds Festival, "is not the best explainer of his own music."

From the Government Printing Office in Washington we have received a "Catalogue of Early Books on Music," by Julia Gregory, prepared under the direction of O. G. Sonneck, chief of the Division of Music. In 1902 the library began systematically to collect old books on music published before 1800 in various languages. The collection now embraces probably more than a third of the entire output before that year, and it was deemed that publication of a catalogue was advisable in the interest of musicology at home and abroad. To students this volume will prove invaluable, for, whereas the compositions of the old masters have been printed abroad in monumental editions under the editorship of competent musical scholars, it is entirely different with the old books on music, few of which are accessible in modern reprints. The aim of Mr. Sonneck has been to get as many of these books as possible rather than first editions when there was no intrinsic reason for favoring these. An index to anonymous works follows the regular text.

Part iv of Vol. II of the Catalogue of the Allen A. Brown Collection of Music in the Public Library of Boston has been issued. It includes the names Penseron to Rossini. Among important heads are Part Songs, Periodicals, and Pianoforte.

A new edition of Finck's "Success in Music and How it is Won," with a chapter on Tempo Rubato by Paderewski, has been issued by the Scribners at a price within the reach of all music students. From the same publishers we have received reprints of Fuller-Maitland's "Schumann" and Sir Julius Benedict's "Weber," two books which, though written a number of years ago, are still the best on their subjects in our language. While Schumann holds his own, Weber is unjustly neglected, especially in the opera houses. A perusal of Benedict's pages brings to mind how much we lose by this neglect.

While some London theatres have entirely abolished music between the acts, partly from motives of economy, partly because nobody seemed to listen to it, others are encouraging it by introducing new features. Thus, the Comedy Theatre announced that "The orchestra will commence at 8 P. M., followed by Miss Evelyn Tyser, violinist." The Queen's Theatre has engaged, besides the usual orchestra, which plays between the acts, a string quartet, which plays in the foyer in order to interest the ladies who may wish to leave their seats.

Cleofonte Campanini will conduct personally the three performances of "Parsifal" to be given in Chicago this season by the opera company of which he is now the general director. He will also produce Massenet's "Don Quichotte," besides "Monna Vanna," Franchetti's "Cristoforo Colombo," Grecchi's "Cassandra," and Leoncavallo's "Zingari." Among the new singers engaged are Florence Macbeth, Rosa Raise, Marta Dorda, Beatrice Wheeler, Amy Evans, Giovanni Martinelli, Lucien Muratore, and Rolf Errolle.

A Verdi document of historic importance is described in foreign journals—a copy of the vocal score of "Lohengrin," with Italian words, which was used by Verdi to follow the performance of that opera in Bologna in 1871, and which he copiously annotated in pencil. It shows no lack of appreciation for the music. The word "bello" occurs frequently, and he has even a "bellissimo" for the dramatic climax of the first scene of Act III. There are some adverse criticisms, too; he finds fault with the slowness of the declamation, particularly in the speeches of the King and the Herald, but this slowness was a fault of the singers which Wagner himself severely censured at other performances. Verdi also points out that the long ensemble which follows the King's prayer has no dramatic value, and makes the scene halt—"fredda la scene" is a note which occurs repeatedly. Evidently the performance was most defective. Verdi notes all the cuts, remarks that the tempi were often hurried, and that the chorus at almost every entry sang abominably out of tune. To Wagner, nevertheless, these performances at Bologna, being the entering wedge for his operas in Italy, seemed so important that he wrote about them to his friend, Arrigo Boito, an appreciative letter, which is published in his collected works.

Probably no other conductor is in such demand as Arthur Nikisch. He has been invited to conduct "Parsifal" next year in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Milan, Paris, London, and Buenos Ayres. But he has refused all these offers because of his regular engagements in Leipzig and Berlin. These allow him, however, to preside over the season of German opera in Covent Garden next spring, when Londoners, who have often admired the interpretations of "Tristan" and the Nibelung operas, will have their first chance to hear his "Meistersinger" also. The other day, after conducting at the Leeds festival, Nikisch left London at nine o'clock, and twenty-five hours later he was rehearsing the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig. Nikisch evidently has taken Hans Richter's place as the idol of England.

Art

AUSTRALIAN PAINTING.

SYDNEY, October 1.

An "exceptionally strong" annual exhibition affords an opportunity of noting some advances in Australian methods of painting. At the same time it is observable that the greatest advances are those made by Australian artists in England. Denied adequate encouragement by the communities that reared them, the best painters have gone to Europe, first to learn their art, and then to breast the competition of their rivals in the Old World, as American painters had once to do, and as Australian men of letters still do. There some of them have been wonderfully successful, as Australian singers have been. One has received the bronze medal of the Paris Salon; two others have gained enviable distinctions there; a fourth, Mr. Lambert, is said to be taking in English portraiture the place left vacant by Mr. Sargent; while others have had their pictures hung "on the line" at the exhibitions of the Royal Academy. Some of these have come back to Australia, "bringing their sheaves with them," but the best remain to reproduce, as Lord Beaconsfield hyperbolically (and, as is known, insincerely) said, "the glories of ancient Greece under the murky skies of England."

Easily the chief of the small Australian band, Mr. Lister-Lister, the president of the Royal Art Society, once more fills the central space of the gallery with one of his huge canvases. Naturally, the site selected as the seat of the Federal Government has waked the rivalry of two artists, and two large pictures perpetuate a scene that will soon have ceased to exist. The verdict of every spectator is expressed by Mr. Griffin, the American architect from Chicago, who has designed the laying out of the ground and the erection of the more imposing structures—that it is an ideal site for a capital city. So it appears, as we gaze. A vast expanse of fairly level country, suited to afford the "magnificent distances" of Washington, meets the eye, and seems to crave exploitation.

Mr. Lister has evidently striven to give his picture the artistic unity that nature has denied to the scene. What he has accomplished in this direction will be the more visible if we contrast his painting with a rival work of more than equal dimensions on the same theme. This is fuller of detail, and delineates the church and village and the farmhouses that dot the landscape. These have disappeared from Mr. Lister's picture, painted from a different point of view, but the work gains by their exclusion or omission. Here we have only nature. The blue of the distant foothills, the deep blue of the sky, the deeper blue of the Molonglo River that winds through the scene, and the white gum-trees in the foreground, lend it a unity, though it is the unity of a few elements.

The scene is characteristically Australian. Yellow, which science tells us is the real color of the sky, still dominates the land, as in so many Australian pictures—whether arising from the lovely wattle, or from the thickly sown Pride of the Heath, or from other wild flowers still. It takes long to accustom one's self to that Chinese dominant, or to blend it with the blues of river, hills, or sky. The blue-birds hop trustfully quite near the spectator, as they do everywhere in Australia, where nature still lords it over man. There, too, are the white gum-trees in the foreground, resembling no other tree, and proclaiming the spirit of endless division—the bole sometimes dividing into two trunks, each bough into half-a-dozen boughs, and every bough into an infinity of branches. Nowhere else in the world, perhaps, are there such trees, with their contorted forms and the wreckage of brittle boughs at their foot.

Some water-colors by the president are still finer than his oils. That of the breakers on the rocks reproduces an everlasting scene, yet it is here "as fresh as on creation's day." The boulders on the sea-beach have an individuality of their own, dyed green with algæ and richly browned or umbered by lichens. Even the sea-pools on the sand, rightly or wrongly, are sky-blue. The Great Australian Bight, by Mr. Will Ashton, is the finest seascape in the exhibition, and the drawing and coloring are doubtless impeccable. The falling of luminous tints on the waves from a few rosy cloudlets in a clear sky is a truly picturesque incident. A parallel scene, by Mr. James Ashton, skilfully shows the gleams of a tropical sunset tinting the indigo-blue waves of the Indian Ocean. Neither is hackneyed, yet neither compares with a sea-view hung some three years ago, and then commented on in these columns, where moonlight on the sea was a dream of beauty.

Two well-known scenes in the Blue Mountains are the Orphan Rock at Katoomba and the Three Sisters at Wentworth Falls, three towering monoliths that bear traces of much weathering and are richly colored. They are only the most conspicuous objects in a rockscape where almost everything is conspicuous. To the right we observe, high up the mountain, a granite physiognomy that reminds us of Hawthorne's "Great Stone Face"; to the left are, as it seems, though seventy miles distant from the sea, large stretches of sea-waves, which are probably but the haze hanging over the mountain slopes; and behind are precipitous cliffs, with a sheer fall of 1,000 feet. Other landscapes are fine enough, but have little in them that is distinctive of Australia. A few foreign scenes—English, Tyrolean, or Italian—might belong to another planet, so alien are they.

To a foreigner, looking at it with eyes trained to other aspects of nature, we owe our introduction to the romance of the bush. Mr. Blamire Young had added a new quality of beauty, hardly to be discerned even in the paintings of Streeton, by a fresh handling of the hard Australian light. But Hans Heysen does something more than this. He infuses or expires a new atmosphere. Have we not wandered through that tract of bush many a good time before? We have, and we have not. We saw those strange trees, but saw them with our natural eyes—at best, with the keenly penetrative eyes of a Lister or an Ashton. Now we see them with the unscaled eyes of the spirit, or at least of Mr. Heysen, who has painted such gum-trees as were never before seen, save in "faëry lands forlorn." Are they illusions? We had best cherish them, for they will soon be gone. Meanwhile, we willingly remain under their spell.

For the first time, the portrait-portion of the gallery is adequate. Unhappily or otherwise, we have among us no Watts, with his "passionate pursuit of strength," as Carlyle said of him; and these portraits are purely naturalistic. In Sir Normand MacLaurin, once of the Challenger Expedition, now the honored chancellor of the University and president of the Royal Society, we see the strong face of one who has had many a tussle with the inequities of things and the perversities of men, but has held on his course unflinchingly, while the Senator has found trenchant utterance for his robust convictions. To this striding ruler a delicate portrait of the late Mr. Broinowski, long the foremost ornithologist of Australia, furnishes a fitting counterpart. It embodies at once the extreme frailty of age, "like an old lady washed in milk," as was said of Cardinal Newman, and the life-long grief of the Polish exile.

The genre paintings are various, but the best of them are again the work of a foreigner. Signor Dattilo-Rubbo delineates the most characteristic types that have ever been produced in Australia.

No other Australian painter could have so powerfully exhibited the Aftermath of the Strike. Everything in it is deeply realist; the disused pick and shovel, standing idly against the wall of the poor cabin, the unused teapot and cup, the belted trousers, and the upturned toes of the boots appeal powerfully to the spectator, while the miner sits bitterly reflecting, with chagrined face. Perhaps in the belief that it may have an educational effect, the picture has been bought for the National Gallery.

Is it not the same head and face, the same personality, in fact, but slightly disguised, that we discern in another masterly delineation? Those six gamblers—are they not the striker over again? A lady of our acquaintance reduces the six to two, and these possibly to one. And as we turn to the portrait of the painter, we are confronted, we feel, with the true and only source of both or all the types. A man can paint no one and nothing but himself, and the striker, the gamblers, the dead-beat, or stone-broke old man in another character-painting, and even the old woman in a companion picture, are all alike variations of the Neapolitan immigrant painter's Protean personality. THE MEANING OF THE PRESENT INACTIVE MARKET.

If it is to be assumed—as it sometimes seems reasonable to assume—that a continuous movement of prices on the Stock Exchange foreshadows the subsequent general course of events in general industry, then the inference from the market of the past two months would naturally be this: The sharp Wall Street recovery of September should have prophesied a generally favorable turn of events in trade; based, like the September stock market, on the two facts that the predicted autumn money stringency had not occurred, and that the uncertainty as to what the new tariff's provisions would or would not be was at last removed. But the further inference, strictly drawn from the later markets, would also be that this show of reviving cheerfulness in business circles would be comparatively brief, and would be succeeded by a spell of despondency, repeating the Wall Street despondency of October. In due course, if the market were still to be taken as a forecast, this spirit of reaction and doubt would be arrested by the discovery that it had been carried further than circumstances of the industrial situation warranted.

It is conceivable that this will be exactly the sequence of events in general business, as it has been thus far on the Stock Exchange. But it is scarcely true that the stock market necessarily, and in all respects, foreshadows the casual fluctuations of industrial activity. The business history of the past six months, for instance—in this country at any rate—has by no means fulfilled the prophecy of the agonized stock markets of the first few months of 1913. The trade developments at the end of 1911 and the beginning of 1912 were not such as might have been predicted from the violent collapse on the Stock Exchange, in the preceding August and September. That was no doubt because, on both occasions, the primary source of the Stock Exchange disorder was the condition of things in Europe, not in the United States. Nevertheless, the general fact remained, even then, that the course of Wall Street prices marked out tendencies, temporary if not permanent, in the broader field of trade.

Perhaps a more important matter for consideration on such occasions is the question, exactly what the causes were behind a given decline on the Stock Exchange, and exactly how far those causes, taken by themselves, were bound to influence trade prosperity as well as the course of financial values. In the present case, causes at work are admittedly numerous. Judge Gary, in his speech to the Iron and Steel Institute on Friday of last week, asked and answered, from his own point of view, the question, "Why is business prosperity so frequently and seriously interrupted?" His judgment was that "it is largely because of much unnecessary agitation and ill-considered criticism by those who have not the nation's best interests at heart"; that "capital, always timid, has been seriously affected by this unreasonable and uncalled-for agitation and attack," and that consequently "it is becoming almost impossible to procure on fair terms, on good security, and at a reasonable rate of interest, the necessary capital to equip or liberally maintain going and successful properties."

The judgment from so high a quarter commands respect, and even those who may not concur in it, as a final explanation of the existing state of things, will agree that anything which increases timidity in the domain of capital must be an aggravating influence. Yet two other facts must be considered with it—one, that the same condition of the market for corporation loans exists, in much more disconcerting shape, in foreign money centres where a wholly different explanation is current for it; the other, that Judge Gary's explanation, taken by itself, would have left no excuse or apology for any different condition during the past ten years. Agitation and criticism, often far more angry and embittered than at the present moment, have existed throughout that stretch of time; but the same period has comprised advancing Stock Exchange prices, booming trade, and an investment market which has absorbed wholly unprecedented quantities of new corporation securities.

The usual habit of economic reasoning, in problems of this sort, is to consider, first, the conditions which exist in the world as a whole; secondly, the extent to which those conditions, in the markets where they are most emphatically in evidence, have affected the course of things in all other markets, and, finally, the prospect for finding a way out of the embarrassment for all the communities involved.

Thus considered, the problem is a large one; not capable of solution by any such simple formula as Judge Gary's. The inference, in the light of past experience, is that the situation must be watched and studied in the quarter where the unpleasant phenomena are most in evidence—in England during 1899, in the United States during 1903 and 1907, in Germany during 1911, and in Europe generally at this moment. There is thus much of distinct encouragement, in the present perplexing situation, to American observers—that, by common agreement of all European economic critics, the position of the United States is to-day intrinsically the strongest of any great market in the world.

The Public Prosecutor of the Terror,
FOUQUIER-TINVILLE
By ALPHONSE DEMOYER

8vo. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 14 Other Illustrations. $3.75 net; by mail, $4.00.

Fouquier-Tinville was one of the most potent and sinister personalities under the Reign of Terror. His activities, influence and downfall are all part of an intensely dramatic career. He denounced and brought to the scaffold no fewer than 2,400 victims, ranging from Marie Antoinette to Robespierre and St. Just. A real contribution to the history of this period, based on original and unpublished documents.

Chicago and the Old Northwest
By MILO M. QUAIFE

This book is in scope and subject-matter a history. But in language and content it is as thrillingly interesting as romance. It is a history of the founding of old Fort Dearborn at the mouth of the Chicago River at the time when the modern metropolis of Chicago was but a wilderness hunted over by Indians. It describes the "Fort Dearborn massacre," the contest of the British and Americans for the Indian trade of the great Northwest, and the Indian wars, massacres, and frontier experiences which figured in the development of Chicago. The work is the most absorbingly interesting contribution to the history of the Northwest that has appeared in years. The book is attractively illustrated.

A History of the People of the United States

From the Revolution to the Civil War

By JOHN BACH McMASTER

VOLUME 8, just published, marks the completion of this treasure of American history. It represents the intelligent and laborious research of thirty years, and is a monument to the author's extraordinary industry. McMaster's work is a history of the people in the strict sense, rather than a mere history of the government. It deals with social quite as much as with political activities. So intimate is this history, so vivid and readable, that its pages often read like records of contemporaneous events. The work shows skill, animation, brightness, force and charm, and is unquestionably the most important history of the people of the United States ever written.

The Nation

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1913.

The Week

Under ordinary circumstances the elections held in the November following the inauguration of a President are not looked to as furnishing any strong indication of the feeling of the country towards the new Administration. But in the present instance the circumstances are not ordinary. As a personality, President Wilson has asserted himself in a way that is highly unusual, both in manner and in matter. He has performed the unprecedented feat of holding Congress in continuous special session not only through the summer, but through the autumn months, and this in spite of the completion two months ago of the great task for which it was primarily assembled. Apart, too, from any personal aspect of the situation, the country has now had two months in which to consider a reduction of the tariff so radical as to afford a searching proof of the reality or unreality of that feeling of alarm which protectionists have always said was bound to seize upon the country when face to face with such a change. In view of these rapid and signal developments, it was inevitable that the elections in many parts of the country should have taken on a special significance. The outcome in each separate instance is, of course, determined in the main by local factors. But taken as a whole, the country will not fail to read, in the result in New York city, in New Jersey, in Massachusetts, in Maryland, and elsewhere a victory for the Wilson Administration. The prestige of the President comes out of the test distinctly heightened.

Next in interest to the question whether the elections would show any indication of a reaction against the new Administration at Washington and the work of the Democratic Congress was that of the light they might throw on the status of the Progressives. The nearest approach to encouragement for the party was given in Massachusetts. In that State Mr. Bird, the Progressive candidate for Governor, polled about 10,000 votes more than Mr. Gardner, the Republican candidate; but this showing is attributable to the personal strength of Bird and the opposition aroused by some of Gardner's utterances and by his stand as one of the leading advocates of severe restriction of immigration. The vote for Bird, however, fell about 54,000 short of that for Walsh, the Democratic candidate. Apart from this one bit of encouragement, the Progressive vote of Tuesday confirms the conclusion, to which enrolment figures and scattering elections have been so distinctly pointing ever since the Presidential election, that the hold of the new party on its following is steadily declining. And the exhibition of strength which the Democratic party has given is bound, in the nature of things, to accelerate this process. These State elections are demonstrating, beyond reasonable doubt, what the Presidential election showed plainly enough—that in a three-cornered fight the Democratic party is sure to be overwhelmingly victorious unless one of its two opponents is reduced to insignificant proportions. And of the two it is certainly not the Republican party that will efface itself. From now on, the gravitation of the Progressives towards their old Republican attachments is likely to be more pronounced than ever.

The blow which the voters of New York laid upon the skull of Tammany this Tuesday is the most smashing which was ever dealt the Hall. Crashing majorities overwhelmed it from every side. It could not even elect a Sheriff in the County of New York! No such splendid opportunity had ever before come to the outraged people, and they seized it eagerly and with joy. The election returns yield evidence of what was suspected in advance, that thousands of even nominal Tammany adherents jumped at the chance to repudiate and destroy the stupid and sordid leadership of Murphy. Upon that Boss at Baltimore last June hisses and execrations were poured from all parts of the Democratic National Convention. Yet he then met them all with a face of brass, secure, as he thought, in his control of the city of New York, and of the State Legislature. But now all this power has been dashed from his hand, his own familiar friends have lifted up their heel against him, and even among his Tammany intimates he can expect only averted looks and reproaches.

At the Southern Commercial Congress at Mobile, now ended, there was an almost unprecedented display of the interest of Americans in South America and South American trade. Besides President Wilson and other officials, the delegates heard representatives of Brazil, Argentina, and the Central American and Pacific States. Señor Pezet, of Peru, invited them to send their "men into Pan-America to ascertain what is needed there." A recent Government report shows our exports to all Latin-America for the last fiscal year to be approximately $335,000,000, against $123,000,000 in 1903, a gain of 183 per cent. During the same period exports to the rest of the world increased only 64 per cent. But the figures are deceptive as to Yankee enterprise, for they prove simply how the consuming power of the republics south of us has increased, and disclose nothing as to the share the United States has supplied. Indeed, this share, as the Bureau of Commerce has just ascertained, was in 1911 no larger than in 1901.

On Saturday, November 1, the process of "collecting at the source," a cardinal feature of the income-tax law, went into active operation. Although it is also a salient feature of the law that the tax will hit only some four hundred thousand individuals, those who counted on the popularity of the bill with all the rest of the hundred million people of the country, on the ground that it does not trouble them at all, will find their expectations in a considerable degree disappointed. The vexations attending the process of exemption will affect, in one way and another, millions of persons. This may have been quite unavoidable if the double purpose of collection at the source and of a high exemption from the tax was to be fulfilled; but, avoidable or not, it will be found a great nuisance, and, until the people get accustomed to it, will provoke an enormous amount of irritation. Americans spend money cheerfully, but they dislike extremely to be compelled to take a lot of petty trouble to comply with official forms, and especially when that compliance involves the making of declarations about their personal affairs.

Some of the faulty provisions of the section were amended in the House; but the general imperfection of its workmanship was left uncured. It was widely expected that the form of the section would be thoroughly recast in the Senate; but nothing of this kind was done. The result is that, after the lapse of months during which the Treasury officials have had the opportunity of anticipating and straightening out every probable difficulty, their efforts have fallen so far short that the law goes into effect with the financial world at sea over its requirements. The experience is not without its lesson in regard to the banking bill. Imperfections in that measure may be lightly brushed aside by Congress or the President, but that will not prevent the working out of their natural consequences if retained in the law. And while the imperfections in the form of the income-tax bill entail, after all, nothing more than a certain amount of worry and inconvenience, the defects that have been pointed out in the banking bill are capable of producing evil results of a most substantial and lasting nature.

The Secretary of the Navy's endorsement of Winston Churchill's propos for an international sabbatical year in the matter of battleship building has in turn been endorsed by Congressmen with a unanimity which may have come as a surprise even to Secretary Daniels. We do not recall when Speaker Clark has said anything to better purpose than his forcible arraignment of the craze for naval construction. Between Mr. Clark and Mr. Mann, who pointed out that large navies are partly to be explained by a desire for contractors' profits, there was left little to be said. If steps towards a formal agreement among the nations for a temporary suspension of naval armament increase are to be taken by any Government, the initiative should come from ourselves. Emanating from Washington, the proposal is not likely to arouse the jealous fears and suspicions which make up the International state of mind in Europe. But one caution is necessary: in suggesting a naval holiday to the nations, this Government must not in any way imply that in its own case there are certain extenuating circumstances which unfortunately, etc. It is this readiness to legislate for others that makes the peace proposals of certain statesmen ridiculous.

Mr. Bryan, replying to criticisms by the anti-saloon people in Maryland, who object to his stumping the State for Blair Lee, Democratic candidate for the United States Senate and a leading opponent of the State-wide Local Option bill, declares that local option is a State issue, and that therefore his present course is not inconsistent with his Nebraska record. The point is not only well taken, but should serve as a reminder of one of the principal benefits of the system of direct election of United States Senators. Under the old method, it would have been impossible for voters to act upon the United States Senatorship on its merits, either personal or political. In such a situation as the present one in Maryland, where the liquor question is a burning issue, they could not elect a State Legislature, on the basis of their views of this issue, and at the same time make effective their desires as to the United States Senate, on the basis of their views upon national issues. Under the direct-election plan, the matter presents no difficulty. The people can vote for State legislators on State issues and for United States Senators on national issues. In the end something of the same kind of benefit will result for our State governments as is coming to our cities through the growing separation of municipal questions from national and State politics.

That a serious movement is on foot at Washington to put a stop to the gross abuse of the franking privilege is pleasing information. The privilege of a free use of the mails within reasonable limits is to be continued to members of Congress under the plan proposed, but instead of an unlimited power of franking they will be entitled to a specified quantity of special stamps, after the exhaustion of which they will have to pay postage on any additional documents or letters they may wish to send through the mails. Along with this scheme of reform and economy, the Democratic leaders are working out a plan for the prevention of the great waste that goes on in the printing of needlessly large editions of public documents. While in this virtuous mood, the gentlemen who are pushing these reforms might well include a third in the field of their efforts. The leave-to-print abuse, which so mars the Congressional Record, has just been illustrated in an extreme form. A Missouri Representative, having got the customary "unanimous consent" for leave "to extend his remarks," procured the insertion in the Congressional Record of a eulogy delivered by ex-Secretary Nagel upon the late Adolphus Busch, the St. Louis brewer.

The opportunity for an excellent test of one of the principal formularies in the Progressive creed is afforded by the Government's suit for the dissolution of the Harvester Trust. In Attorney-General McReynolds's brief, George W. Perkins is named as the father of the Harvester Trust. When the suit comes to trial and Mr. Perkins appears in court, will his line of defence be that the International Harvester Company is not a Trust, that it does not represent monopoly, and that it has, in fact, encouraged competition—this being the latest ingenious argument in behalf of industrial combinations; or will Mr. Perkins exhibit the courage of his convictions and fight the Government's suit on the theory that the age of competition is dead and that coöperation has come to stay? This is the inconsistency observable in the usual procedure of Big Business in the face of Government prosecution. Out of court the Trust advocates never tire of inveighing against the outworn, mediæval theory of competition in contrast with the new and "inevitable" law of combination. In court, they usually argue that there is no such thing as monopoly, and that equality of opportunity in business flourishes under the stimulus of scientific coöperation; coöperation being that principle of business by which George W. Perkins, instead of competing with his rivals, works harmoniously with himself.

Wisconsin has issued its first life insurance policy, and hence has actually begun the experiment of State life insurance in this country. The law providing for it was passed in 1911. It issues seven different kinds of policies, but at present they are limited to a maximum of $1,000. When two thousand policies have been issued, the amount will be raised to $2,000; and when three thousand have been issued, it will be increased to $3,000, which is the limit under the law as it stands. Premiums may be paid monthly, and profits are eventually to be returned to policyholders. Care has been taken to keep down the cost of operating the system. No paid agents are employed, but applications will be received by city, town, and county clerks and treasurers, officials in banks that receive State deposits, and State factory inspectors. No new offices have been created in connection with the plan. State insurance is not a new thing for Wisconsin, as it began to insure its public buildings, including those of the University, in 1903. The burning of the Capitol in 1905 left a deficit in the insurance fund of $190,000, but the State stuck to the system, and the accumulations in the fund since then have wiped out the deficit.

There is so much debate about mothers' pensions that the first definite report on the Oregon law will be of interest. Four months' operation has produced certain unexpected results. The first is the encouragement to fraud, 50 per cent. of the applications having been refused. "In many cases," according to the local investigators, "perjury has been committed, and false affidavits as to financial status made." On the other hand, deserving widows have shrunk from the publicity of asking State aid. "In the mass of inquiries confronting the pension officers it has been felt that there may be many needy and proud mothers whose wants are not even known." But a graver fault is attendant upon the stoppage of the old local aid within struggling families. Says the Seattle Post-Intelligencer:

> The law has filled the children's homes very nearly to capacity through the giving up to institutional charge of the children of unsuccessful applicants. Prior to the taking effect of the law, mothers made every effort to hold the children of the family together. When it was discovered that absolute penury is a condition precedent to the granting of a pension, families began to break up.

If not characteristic faults, these may at least be said to be fundamental difficulties in a scheme the objects of which all applaud. The scope of the Oregon law may be gathered from the fact that in the average county are 60 pensioners, costing $1,200 monthly, and that the State outlay for the year is estimated at $300,000.

Christabel Pankhurst is a resident of Paris, but in spirit and tone she is a citizen of New York. Can anything be more typically native than Miss Pankhurst's explanation of the criticism that has been stirred in this city by the nature of some of the articles in the Suffragette? It is all very simple, according to Miss Pankhurst:

> In New York, vice is organized, blatant, and powerful. There vice is a huge business. The people concerned in it believe the articles in the Suffragette are bad for the trade. These interests are now alarmed, and from the tone of some of the articles appearing, I believe a portion of the press is subsidized.

What is Christabel doing in Paris? Her place is in New York, where every protest against the exploitation of filth in the theatre obviously emanates from some one interested in the maintenance of white slavery; where every person who has his doubts about sex-hygiene in the public schools is directly interested in the perpetuation of the social evil; where every exception taken to the wild statistics of the would-be world-reformers is obviously dictated by personal interest in the maintenance of child labor, infant mortality, and tuberculosis in the tenements; where every one in general who disagrees with you is either vicious or subsidized. The slogan of the up-to-date crusader is no longer, "Whoever is not for me is against me," but, "Whoever is not for me is in the pay of the Tenderloin."

The bill to end the regency in Bavaria, and to permit the present Regent to proclaim himself King, has passed the lower house of the Bavarian Parliament by a vote of 122 to 27, two Democrats joining the twenty-five Socialists in the opposition. As the upper house has already sanctioned the measure, the termination of the reign of the crazy King Otto is at hand. That has lasted since June 13, 1886, when the tragic end of King Ludwig took place in the lake of Starnberg. The old Prince Regent, whose death occurred last year, was bitterly opposed to taking the royal title; not only thrice, but many more times, did he refuse the crown. The present Prince Regent has from the first been ready to have the title bestowed upon him, and as he is now nearly sixty-nine years of age, he was indisposed to have any delay interposed. While Bavaria can hardly be said to have suffered by the regency, it has involved much circumlocution and unnecessary expense. Curiously enough, the Regent for whom this Constitutional change is so cheerfully made is by no means as popular as his father, who would not accept the honor.

"Shortage of food and fuel," "general strike," "privations for the poorer classes"—these phrases occur in a dispatch, not from Pennsylvania or Massachusetts, nor yet from England or Belgium, but from New Zealand. A bitter struggle is going on there between the employers and the Federation of Labor. The Compulsory Arbitration and Conciliation Act was passed eleven years ago, and has doubtless been very effective in the prevention of strikes and lockouts; but it appears that the designation of New Zealand as a "land without strikes" was somewhat premature. As for the "poorer classes," who have been brought so quickly face to face with serious privations, we were almost led, not many years ago, to conclude that nothing answering to that description continued to exist in New Zealand after the labor party got control of affairs. New Zealand, like some of our Pacific Coast States, is indeed, as it has been called, a political experiment station, and the experiences of these communities will yield valuable instruction. But even in a laboratory of physical science it is usually necessary to experiment for a long time, to make all sorts of tests for verification and the elimination of chance factors, before one can arrive at a trustworthy conclusion. To clamor for the adoption of the single tax, or the initiative and referendum, here in New York, because of results alleged to have been shown by a few years' experience in Saskatchewan or New Zealand, is childish. A far more extensive experience would be needed to give force to such an argument, even if there were no other defect in it; but there is besides the question to what extent the facts alleged as to these distant places may be due to the advantages they possess in the shape of great undeveloped areas open to exploitation by a small population.

SANITY AND WORLD-BETTERMENT.

"The American mothers are unable to nurse their children for the necessary nine months. This is the cause of all the infant mortality we hear so much about." We find this in the report, in a Chicago newspaper, of the first of a series of lectures on sex hygiene which are given, for the benefit of fathers and mothers, in the public school buildings of that city. There are a number of sober and sensible things in the lecture. There are a number of other things which, like the part we have quoted, exhibit that taint of rash irresponsibility which mars a good deal of the very recent agitation for world-betterment. When the lecturer spoke of "the infant mortality we hear so much about," the mothers who hung upon her words could put but one significance upon what she was saying—that infant mortality is on the increase, and that this increase is due to our modern conditions. But what we actually "hear so much about" in the writings of health authorities on infant mortality is that the infantile death-rate ought to be cut down far below what it is, not because it is higher than it used to be, but for precisely the opposite reason. It is because infant mortality has been so decidedly reduced by modern effort that hygienists are able to insist on the practical duty of reducing it still more.

A certain amount of exaggeration, and especially of exaggerated emphasis, is to be expected in all reform movements. But the thing that we have in mind, which is encountered on all sides these days, and of which the assertion we have cited is a small but convenient example, involves something more than exaggeration. The state of mind behind it is something very different from the justifiable over-enthusiasm of the reformer. It amounts to little less than sheer irresponsibility, and it not infrequently betrays a want of fundamental soundness which, for lack of a better term, must be classed as a moral rather than an intellectual defect. It is a state of mind of which Felix Adler, in a recent address, discussed a number of significant illustrations. "Those," he said, "who seek, and we admit earnestly and sincerely seek, to promote the moral improvement of mankind are often themselves unwittingly sowing the seeds of moral evil." His instances were drawn from many sides—ranging from the moral confusion that has been shown in the case of Sulzer to that exhibited by a prominent social worker who, in connection with the minimum-wage agitation, declared that she regarded it an open question whether a girl was not justified in choosing a life of shame rather than struggle to get along with inadequate wages. He found an illustration of essentially the same false vision in the attitude of those who, having awakened to the fact that the country has suffered from fetich-worship of the Constitution, are ready to plunge into the opposite extreme, to deify the mother-wit of the masses and scorn the teachings of experience. And, in another way, the crude proposals of popular eugenics were held up as illustrating forgetfulness of the deepest and most precious elements of human life.

To the voice of sober criticism we are quite aware that the exponents of easy-going world-betterment have a ready answer. To find fault with them, to expose either the dangers of their proposals or the looseness of their assertions or the audacity of their arguments, is to write one's self down a reactionary. It is no doubt true that opposition to proposals of social-betterment often does rest on mere narrowness or obstinacy. But to put that brand on all conservative judgment, all careful thinking, is to exhibit once again the very quality of which we have been speaking. A man may be a sincere advocate of and worker for progress, yet be thoroughly impressed with the knowledge that the world was not made yesterday. When confronted with the proposal that the regulation of child labor should be made the business of the national Government, on the ground that conditions are getting desperate, it is not standpatism, but simply truth and soberness, to point out that, so far from conditions being desperate, remarkably rapid progress has been made in the matter without national interposition. When told that without the initiative and referendum nothing can be accomplished for the people against the wicked moneyed interests, it is merely sanity, not obstructionism, to point to things like the growth of effective control of public-service corporations in the principal States and in the nation, the smooth and rapid course of the comprehensive and radical factory legislation enacted in New York, the progress of the workmen's-compensation movement, the adoption of the income-tax amendment to the United States Constitution.

There is no institution of mankind, whether social or political, which cannot be shown to fall sadly short of ideal perfection in practice. It is easy to prove that marriage is a failure, that parental authority is a curse, that punishment of criminals causes crime, that respect for the law breeds injustice, that education stifles originality, that private property and the competitive system cause want and misery. All you have to do is to fix your mind on the cases in which these things are true, and refuse to balance them against those of the opposite kind, or to consider what evils are threatened by the alternatives. And to this must be added the more special, but still extremely important, confusion of thought to which irresponsible reformers are so generally addicted—the substitution of the assertion that an evil is growing worse for the mere assertion that the evil exists. Whether infant mortality is increasing or diminishing, whether conditions in our city tenements are worse or better than they were forty years ago, may be all one to the muckraker or the sentimental agitator; but to the sane thinker it makes all the difference between a case and no case for the advocates of rash or revolutionary remedies.

DETECTING THE DETECTAPHONE.

The use—and abuse—of the dectectaphone in the New York campaign has been such as to raise many queries. One of them relates to the morality of the whole procedure, as employed in politics, and in the case of men not suspected of being criminals. The historically-minded may well ask if we are not seeing the revival, in a modern democracy, of a method made abhorrent by ancient tyranny and oppression. Is not the detectaphone in an Executive office an artifice worthy of a Dionysius? Does it not remind one of an eavesdropping Grand Inquisitor? Yet what we all set down as an act of suspicion and cruelty in one age, some of us are ready to acclaim as one of the finest instruments ever invented for eliciting the truth.

But does it elicit the truth? This is a point more important than the other. In a mechanical age, it is easy to induce people to believe that a piece of machinery is the best aid we have in sifting the true from the false. Wires and membranes cannot lie. Automatic records are more trustworthy than human testimony. Mechanism is surer than mind. But all such glib and comfortable assurances, easy as it is for the unthinking to swallow them whole, need to be examined. It is necessary to know, first of all, something about the mechanic as well as the mechanism. Proof by photography used to be thought infallible. But photographs can be faked. Dr. Cook had a photograph of the North Pole and also of the summit of Mt. McKinley, neither of which he ever saw. And it would appear that the detectaphone can be "doctored"—or, at least, directed. If left to work with mechanical accuracy, it yet cannot guard, more successfully than the telephone, against impersonations. We had last week the alleged record by detectaphone of a conversation between Sulzer and Delaney. The latter at once affirmed that it was forged; that if any conversation of the sort ever occurred, it must have been taken part in by somebody pretending to be Delaney; and then he added one convincing point. The record as given made Sulzer ask only a few brief questions. At the actual interview between them, Delaney affirmed, Sulzer talked an hour. This is a fine touch of verisimilitude. Sulzer was always talking an hour. If the detectaphone did not show this, then it was a lying spirit.

What we would urge is merely the folly of abdicating human reason in the presence of a machine. There is no mechanical road to the truth and nothing but the truth. In judging any kind of evidence, whether it comes from the lips of men or from films and registers, we simply have got to stick to what we know of probability and what we know of human nature. Some things are flatly incredible, even if a machine ticks them off to us. A sagacious mind will insist that a machine can get out of order, or be bedevilled, easier than the great maxims of human conduct can all be shattered. It is not a question of refusing to believe one's eyes or ears; it is simply the rational attitude of maintaining that when the eye or ear seems to report a huge improbability, it is necessary to scrutinize closely the apparatus—or its operator—by means of which we get the impression. Even in a detectaphone, things may not be what they seem!

Take the matter of some of the conversations which Sulzer alleges to have passed between himself and Judge McCall. The hint is given that, if their accuracy were challenged, a confirmation by detectaphone might be forthcoming. But a thousand detectaphones could not make a man in his senses believe that McCall ever used to Sulzer the language which the latter pretends to repeat. "Never mind the taxpayers," McCall is said to have urged the Governor. "If you will stop Hennessy and quit investigating graft, everything will be all right." There was much more of the sort. But Judge McCall was quite right in saying that it was needless for him to deny that he had ever uttered such words. It is not a question of character or of motive. Men simply do not talk in that way. If a machine says they do, then the machine lies. If that be libel, let the machine make the most of it—and sue!

Human credulity is, we know, almost boundless, but that is only a reason for resisting every attempt to impose upon it. And against these mechanical attempts we ought especially to be on our guard, since they are so insidious in an age which almost deifies machinery. There is no way of substituting anything for the human intellect as the final judge of what is true. All the aids and devices that can be invented are to be welcomed, but what they are able to furnish is, after all, only so much more evidence. And that evidence, with all the rest, has to be weighed and sifted by the mind.

AN OLD BUT DISAPPEARING TYPE.

There was buried on Sunday a man of great riches and great folly, dead at thirty-seven. His end was undoubtedly hastened by excesses, though these were not all of the vulgar, roistering kind. It was a case, rather, of temperamental debauchery, an entirely perverse and mistaken attitude towards life. His coming into control of millions of money went to his head. He could think of nothing but speed and glitter and splurge. For him travel must mean special trains breaking the record. The thing to do was to toss the waiter a $1,000 bill and tell him to keep the change. Son of a Stock Exchange "plunger," his sole idea seemed to be to make of life one prolonged plunge. Plenty of lights and a continual parade were closely bound up with his notion of human happiness. He ostentatiously took for his motto: "A short life but a merry one."

It was certainly short, but was it merry? Putting the matter merely on the ground of the "fun" to be got out of life, did not this man make a sad mess of his opportunities? Reckless prodigality and riotous living are often preached against and condemned as sinful, and so they are. But mere reproach on moral or religious grounds, or reminders of the fearful looking for of judgment which at times must haunt the sinner, cannot strike home as does the very spectacle of a mad career defeating itself and carrying its own punishment along with it day by day. With many, we think, a more powerful appeal could be made on the score of stupidity and futility than on that of wickedness alone. The argument underlies President Eliot's address on "The Durable Satisfactions of Life." Satisfactions may be sought, and pleasures, but they ought to be of the sort that go on mounting from year to year, and do not burn out miserably to the socket. What punishment of habitual sins could be more severe than the satiety which dogs them? A giddy youth cannot get flown with wine more than so many times; he cannot very long find exhilaration in lighting cigarettes with $100 bills; his most wild and foolish inventions in the way of indulgence and revelry soon pall upon him. An immense weariness inevitably descends upon him, and the moments recur oftener when he turns with something like loathing from the devices to which he has resorted in order to make his jaded sensibilities vibrate, with the mournful confession, "I have no pleasure in them." And often, as in the instance referred to, just as the period has been reached when plans should be maturing and the outlook for durable satisfactions broadened, the furies come and slit the thin-spun thread of life.

The rake is an old type. If we have the poor always with us, so we seem to have the gilded fool. But there is some comfort in the thought that the type is, on the whole, disappearing. Especially in this country has the placing of large wealth in the hands of a young man ceased to mean the almost inevitable moral degeneration which was once thought of as the general rule. It is not so much an access of virtue which is responsible for the change, as an access of good sense, with improved social standards and new convictions of public duty. It is no longer "good form" to be a harum-scarum debauchee. Instead of being thought amusing, he is regarded as disgusting. And there is a gain in the very fact of being more accustomed to large fortunes. Our society is steadier about them now. They do not so frequently intoxicate youth coming into their possession. It would be possible to name a considerable number of young men, with a great deal of money at their disposal, who are among the most sober-minded of citizens, and who give their time and money to civic duties. If the old type of jeunesse dorée still lingers, with its warnings, the new type of steady-going and useful young millionaire is all the time becoming more abundant.

Fashion, even in morals, is a great thing to have on the right side; and in the matter of which we are speaking there can be no doubt that the fashion is better than it used to be. What we have still to contend against is a kind of surviving tradition in favor of the flamboyant young "spender." He is pictured as somehow far more genial than his opposite. Clive Newcome is pitted against Barnes. But we are coming to see the fallacy of all this. To be a "good fellow" does not necessarily imply that a rich young man must necessarily be a great fool. There can be as much real joy of life in the long and interested pursuit of some object worthy of human intelligence as in devotion to things that perish with the using. And the world is happily awaking to the need, in the face of all the discontent and political peril which the sight of misemployed wealth provokes, of insisting that richesse, too, oblige.

SOME SHIPPING PROBLEMS.

The passage by the Senate last Friday of Senator La Follette's bill for promoting safety at sea, and for improving the conditions of service of American sailors, abolishing arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion, has been heralded as a long step towards making the ocean more attractive for young Americans. If the bill becomes a law, every one must hope that it will achieve the ends sought. There are those, however, who insist, from the shipowner's point of view, that the bill will hinder the long-deferred revival of our shipping. Mr. Robert Dollar, of San Francisco, to whose articles on the ocean-carrying problem we have already referred, declares that Senator La Follette's measure is "the most vicious and bad bill that has ever been aimed at our shipping." Whatever allowances must be made for such words, because of Mr. Dollar's personal interest as an owner, the fact remains that the readjustments called for by the bill, whether justified or not, will further handicap American ships in their competition with foreign vessels, by increasing the cost of operation.

Mr. Dollar's opinions are unusually weighty, for several reasons. He is sailing his steamers under the English and American flags, side by side, in the same trade, and is, therefore, able to give exact figures as to comparative costs. He is avowedly eager to have the service conditions of seamen improved, and he is absolutely opposed to subsidies from the Treasury of the nation. As to the latter, he expresses his views in the following vigorous language:

> To our Congressmen I cannot help repeating what I have said on many occasions. The shipowners want none of your subsidies or assistance of any kind or description. We have given up going to you as beggars, with our hats in our hands, and now tell you to give us no advantage of any kind whatever, but we demand that you put us on exactly the same footing as other nations put their shipowners; namely, permit us to buy our ships where we can get them cheapest, and to operate them under the same conditions as our foreign competitors are doing, and give us no better terms than they enjoy of any kind or description. The American shipowners will do the rest and give our country an American merchant marine worthy of the name.

Care in framing any legislation is further dictated by the fact that two of the three recent happenings of serious import to our merchant marine have resulted only in discouragement. Thus, when Congress made it possible to purchase ships abroad and obtain an American registry for them, it was believed that much of the 2,000,000 tonnage under foreign flags now owned by Americans would promptly hoist the Stars and Stripes. Not a single vessel has, however, availed itself of this legislation—the remedy upon which President Cleveland laid such stress in the eighties. Again, the Panama Canal is on the verge of completion, yet, despite the glowing prophecies of high officialdom, our shipyards are not teeming with orders for new vessels to use it. While there has been some talk of new lines, it has chiefly related to foreign vessels, and little or nothing has been done on this side of the ocean. Where is that wonderful trade to come from of which Mr. Wilson spoke on Monday of last week? Mr. Dollar declares that there is not one vessel in the great lumber-carrying trade of the Northwest which is large enough to make a profitable voyage with lumber from San Francisco to New York by way of the Canal. The length of the voyage necessitates big ships. There are only six American passenger steamers running to the Orient from our Pacific Coast, and, under the law, as they are owned by railways, they cannot use the Canal.

Obviously, if that new waterway is to have any great effect in building up our merchant marine, it must needs be a matter of slow growth. It cannot overcome the handicaps which Mr. Dollar holds responsible for the prostration of our shipping. He is equally skeptical as to the effect of the 5 per cent. rebate to American ships in the Underwood tariff. This he declares "is a joke and makes shipowners smile"; for it will only "in the slightest degree equalize the excessive cost of building and operating American ships as compared with foreign ships." The two millions of gross tons of American-owned foreign ships go profitably under foreign flags. The question, then, is how can they be assured the same profit under our flag? Is this possible, with due regard for humanitarian conditions and safety at sea? The question deserves most careful study and calls for a revision of our laws, not in piecemeal style, but as a whole. Mr. Dollar itemizes several governmental handicaps which the Secretary of Commerce ought to be able to mitigate or do away with altogether. Mr. Steven B. Ayres, lately Congressman from New York, thinks we should have a Commerce Commission to prevent rebating, and to exclude from our ports foreign ships guilty of this or of being part of any combination in restraint of trade. This seems to offer but faint hope of filling our shipyards and our harbors with American craft. It emphasizes again, however, the necessity of a prompt and far-reaching inquiry into all phases of this difficult but vital problem.

CARD-CATALOGUING THE STAGE.

Theatrical managers have often on their lips the phrase, What the public wants. The layman has not always been convinced that they knew quite what is implied by it. He, poor man, in surveying any theatrical season, has seen little more than an unclassifiable variety of plays. Besides raw, so-called red-blooded, red-lighted pieces, he has observed spectacular phantasies, roaring farces, certain excellent subdued comedies, sometimes with settings as remote as the eighteenth century, with an occasional Shakespeare. He wonders whether popular tastes are sufficiently homogeneous to be embodied in the term "public," and concludes merely that a good play will nearly always go and that a certain number of poor plays contrive to have their runs. He is still sanguine to the extent of believing that the best in human nature can be stirred by the stage, but that, left to itself, the human-natured public will not always select the best.

But it now appears that the layman has been all wrong. While he has been groping, the theatrical manager has been employing such a scientific device as the card catalogue. Mr. George Cohan in the current McClure's has divided emotions felt by an audience into three large classes: tears, laughs, and thrills; and enumerates well-known managerial tricks to produce each. Some of the leading "tear-getters," to use his matter-of-fact phrase, are the following: "A child in a nightie saying his 'Now I lay me' "; "a little child dying on the stage"; "any love-scene played in the moonlight"; "an errant woman at bay and crying out, 'I am not a bad woman' "; "a lost child returned to its mother"; "a character laboring under great sorrow with a smile on his face." Nearly all these details are documented by reference to recent successful plays.

The "laughs" are too well known to need citing; most of them are varieties of slap-stick humor. The writer reckons, for instance, that "Mr. Field's favorite trick of poking his forefinger periodically in Mr. Weber's eye is worth a large fortune." But the layman will be surprised to learn of some of the ingenuous ways by which "thrills" are produced. Sometimes a pistol which has no part in the action is kept in sight to help along a dull scene, or the stage is darkened without logical reason, simply to create an effect of ominousness. In such a scene it is well to have a man carrying a lantern, because a human being's shadow on the wall never fails to thrill. Oddly enough, the indication of mere lapse of time has an exciting effect; that is the reason for the frequent use of a loud-ticking clock.

Other theatrical managers have attempted to explain the art of present-day drama, but we recall no such candid exposé as this. We suspect, however, that there is much more which has not been told, and that plans are making to consult the public even further. It is well enough to know what will make people laugh or weep, but what of the persons who hate above all things to shed a tear in public? What of others who laugh and then are ashamed to think of what has caused their merriment? "One character steps on the sore foot of another character, causing the latter to jump with pain"—what decorous lady cares to be caught in the act of shouting for glee over that? In some way the card catalogue must consult the public on these matters. Since moving audiences is a cold-blooded "proposition," nothing which will serve their convenience is too calculating. A hint might be taken from certain periodicals which in a preface explain to a reader how he should feel towards the story which follows. At least there could be an indication in advance precisely when the tears, laughs, and thrills were to be expected, that the audience might be properly braced for them; the stated times in conjunction with the ticking clock would, besides, be most effective.

The persons who will profit most by Mr. Cohan's revelations are, of course, the budding playwrights. To them these will be what the rhyming dictionary is to the aspiring poet, and much more. Let them remember that Shakespeare himself was economical, and was glad to borrow good old standbys. Knowing that a ghost was a "thriller," he promptly put one in "Hamlet"; only, the ghost, unlike the "pistol," really has something to do with the play. But our looser requirements make it much easier for the writer. Dramatic conscience is all right so long as the public desires it, yet what purpose will it serve if, just when the central character is developing into the quiet resignation which the theme demands, the audience is waiting anxiously for the smash of a flying water pitcher?

Mr. Cohan has at least furnished the explanation of a modern trait of the drama. It requires no more than a quarter-century of retrospect to see that the great run of plays to-day are a jumble of incoherent incidents. Even the lighter plays and musical comedies once had a definite fabric. "The Old Homestead," "Pinafore," "Robin Hood" reveal a conscience, with adherence to a central theme. The tripod and cauldron figure in "Robin Hood" because men must eat, not because at that point the public thought that a fire on the stage would look pretty. It is just possible that human nature has not changed much since those days, and that an audience would still be quite content to have even comic plays hold together. In that case the manager's card catalogue is an index simply of the things which have recently had some success on the stage, not of what might be successful. No embryonic Gilbert now living need despair.

STAMP-COLLECTING.

The grand prize trophy awarded at the International Philatelic Exhibition last Thursday evening was a bronze figure of Diana. Doubtless the goddess would be as astonished as pleased at this latest tribute to her, and yet what could be a more fitting symbol of the successful stamp-collector than an image of the patroness of hunting? Nor need even a resident of Olympus feel any humiliation in this association. Stamp-collecting is only a hobby, it is true, but how many other hobbies are honored with learned disquisitions in the encyclopædias? This is all the more notable when the youthfulness of the pursuit is considered. There is no ancient smell about stamp-collecting. Collectors of rare books may boast that their hobby goes back at least as far as the time of Henry VIII, but stamps are not only a modern, but a late invention. The first British penny and two-penny stamps were not issued until 1840. Here, however, the superior keenness of the stamp-collector's genius showed itself. Books, even printed books, were half a century old before any one bethought himself of the delight of preserving the choicest of them for any purpose beyond that of merely reading them, and the idea might not have occurred to anybody then if a monarch had not strongly aided in its inception by wrecking the monasteries where they were chiefly to be found. But stamp-collecting began almost as soon as there were stamps to collect.

No less than three great British institutions lent their aid in the inauguration of this very modern hobby. It was an official of the British Museum who won the distinction of being actually the first to collect the new objects; the Times opened its columns as early as 1841 for an advertisement asking for gifts of cancelled stamps for a young lady; and the following year the new hobby was ridiculed in Punch. Under such auspices, the speedy establishment of the new interest as one of the most serious occupations in which man can engage was certain. Only twenty years after the gifts of cancelled stamps were sought for the young Englishwoman, Strasburg, then a French city, published a catalogue of stamps issued up to that time. Forty years more, and the overburdened collectors were considering the formation of a universal union in order "to discourage unnecessary or speculative issues." For by this time, the pursuit had gone such lengths that specialization had to be resorted to. As a scholar nowadays may limit himself to the genitive case in Anglo-Saxon literature, and his pupils confine themselves to the subjective genitive in the Anglo-Saxon "Chronicle," so most stamp-collectors were soon compelled to restrict their efforts to the issues of one country, or to some related but narrower interest, such as postcards or newspaper-wrappers.

Yet, no matter how small the field which the stamp-collector finally admits to himself is all that he can attempt, this element of completeness constitutes its glory over that of any other hobby to which his friends may be devoting their energy. For what is a stamp but a stamp? If it happens to be a work of art, or the opposite, or to be of an odd shape, this circumstance may add to its appeal to the eye, but that is all. Its place in the precious album is fixed, not by intrinsic value or artistic merit, but solely by the fact that its absence would leave a vacant space in the series to which it belongs. To some extent, this consideration applies to other collecting hobbies, but with two important qualifications. One is that indicated by the words, "to some extent." The other is of a more profound character. Whoever collects books, however ignorant or indifferent he may be regarding their contents, is reminded now and then that they once served, and quite possibly still serve, a higher purpose than that for which he desires them.

From such extraneous interests the stamp-collector is free. As he gazes with awe upon the one known copy of the one-cent stamp of the 1856 issue of British Guiana, his soul thrills with joy. He may be utterly oblivious to the shape, size, color, or decoration of the bit of paper before him. Its mere presence satisfies him. His album will never hold the priceless issue, but it is here, and that is enough. The heedless world has not lost it. Is there any other pursuit in life which is so absolutely detached from considerations of intrinsic worth? Collectors of gavels and canes and inkstands may protest that their affection is as pure, but their claims will not bear the slightest investigation. These objects were made to endure, and, though they have been raised beyond their expectations to the class of collected things, they are capable of use yet, if occasion require. But a stamp, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the cancelling machine, what hold has it upon immortality except just this, that it has lived?

MISCELLANEOUS GERMAN BOOKS.

Among the German writers whose fiftieth birthday gave rise to appreciative articles "Otto Ernst" is not a stranger to America, where his "Flachsmann als Erzieher" has been played and his autobiographical novel, "Asmus Sempers Jugendland," has had not a few readers. Ottomar Enking, in a sympathetic study, "Otto Ernst und sein Schaffen" (Leipzig: L. Staackmann), reviews the author's development (in life he is Ernst Schmidt) as suggested in that novel, and comments on the stately number of books of verse, drama, and fiction that bear his name. He does not belong to the vanguard of revolutionary Young Germany. During that storm-and-stress period he was absorbed in teaching and proselyting for a broader conception of the German "Volksschulideal." He wrote and lectured in favor of an æsthetic education, which, though indicated by Schiller, had been completely lost sight of; and he entitled one of his treatises "The Renaissance of Pedagogy." Ernst Schmidt the teacher is the best interpreter of Otto Ernst the writer. For though neither his plays nor his stories have a distinct Tendenz, they all hold a message and have a strong ethical quality.

The latest book by Otto Ernst himself, "Aus meinem Sommergarten" (L. Staackmann), is a remarkable specimen of his wisdom and humor. In these talks with his readers he treats a variety of homely topics: the follies of fashion and the vagaries of social etiquette, the relation between parents and children, the pleasant and unpleasant sides of summer travel, etc. But the most delightful papers in the book are those in which he seems to draw upon his experiences with children. In all these glimpses of child souls and pictures of child life there is a refreshing spontaneity. Ernst's prose is simple; it does not partake of the stylistic extravagances which frequently offend good taste and judgment in the writings of the younger men. Though he has no special creed to promulgate, he offers an abundance of suggestion.

Dr. Max Kemmerich, whose book, "Zur Geschichte der menschlichen Dummheit," attracted a great deal of attention, has published another volume of studies along similar lines, "Prophezeihungen: alter Aberglaube oder neue Wahrheit?" (Munich: Albert Langen). He has earned for himself a unique place in the German book-world, for his knowledge of the history, folklore, and religions of mankind is amazing, and his impartial attitude in the quest for truth is admirable. In a previous work he had collected data showing the range and the power of popular superstitions; in this book he produces abundant proof that there are "superstitions" with a grain of truth that can be verified by science. Among them is the gift of prophecy, not so long ago absolutely denied and now admitted to exist, though the inferences it suggests will not be applied to our reading of life until many more decades have passed. He closes his preface with a plea, not for faith in his statements, but for doubt; for doubt, as he understands it, is not satisfied with criticism of individual facts, nor stops with hypotheses, theories, or dogmas. Excluding all prophecies which through numerous revisions and modifications of their original form have lost their trustworthiness, he passes in review the prophets of antiquity, Hebrew, Greek, and Roman, and analyzes some remarkable examples from the Middle Ages and more recent times. About two hundred pages of the volume are taken up by well-substantiated reports of individual cases of historical importance. Such is the prophecy of an abbot in the convent of Lehnin concerning the fate of the house of Brandenburg, of another seer who foretold the horrors of the Thirty Years' War, of Christian Hering of Saxony, who predicted the political events in Germany in the latter half of the eighteenth century; of Johann Adam Müller, who warned the King of Prussia of the Napoleonic menace, of Cazotte's vision of the French Revolution, and others. The final chapter deals with the relations of science and prophecy.

The literary life of Austria is so curiously centralized in Vienna that one rarely thinks of writers, publishers, and magazines in other cities of the Hapsburg empire. Yet Budapest has a dozen writers, like the Orientalist Bacher, the polylingual translator Wechsler, the historian and journalist Stern, the essayist Georg von Lukacs, and the clever contributor to Simplicissimus, Frau Marie Liebermann, known under the pseudonym "M. Roda Roda"; Graz has Peter Rosegger, Wilhelm Fischer, and Rudolf Hans Bartsch; Prague has August Sauer, Friedrich Adler, and Hugo Salus; Salzburg has Prince Wrede, Dora Hohlfeld, who, although of Wesphalian origin, is of Pan-German significance, and Hermann Bahr. Recently Innsbruck has come in for its share of literary activity as the home of a new magazine and a publishing house, Der Brenner and "Brenner-Verlag," which attract independents and secessionists from various standards, yet preserve a wholesome reverence for the masters of the past. Among the books published by the Brenner-Verlag that have aroused attention are two volumes of essays by Carl Dallago, "Philister" and "Otto Weininger und sein Werk," which have been highly commended for their impersonal philosophical spirit. Dallago is one of three authors whose names appear on the title-page of "Studien über Karl Kraus," the others being Ludwig von Ficker and Karl Borromäus Heinrich, one of the editors of Simplicissimus. The subject of these studies is a much-disputed figure in the literary world of Vienna, where he has long fought journalistic corruption and other abuses, and a writer highly appreciated as an ethical force in German letters by men whose judgment is not biassed by local prejudices. Dallago calls Kraus an "anti-intellectual," aflame with just wrath against the spirit of trade and barter which is no longer a characteristic of his race, the Jews, but of modern society, regardless of race. He recognizes a boundless human kindness as the fundamental quality of the character of Kraus, but a kindness which, when trodden upon, changes into hardness. He sees evidences of this in the style of Kraus, which could not be as polished as it is, were it not so hard. Dallago gives the outsider a key to the position of Kraus in the literature of Austria and Germany by quoting this passage from one of his writings:

> Wehe der Zeit, in welcher Kunst die Erde nicht unsicher macht und vor dem Abgrund, der den Künstler vom Menschen trennt, dem Künstler schwindlig wird und nicht dem Menschen.

Wilhelm Bölsche, who has traced for us the line of evolution from the bacillus to primeval man, unravelled the mysteries of love-life in nature, and told us the secrets of the star-world in graceful prose, has just published a new book. It derives its title "Stirb und Werde" (Jena: Eugen Diederichs) from Goetho's

> Und so lang Du das nicht hast,
> Dieses Stirb und Werde,
> Bist du nur ein trüber Gast
> Auf der dunklen Erde.

In the initial paper on the colors of the primeval world, he conjures before the reader's eye the survivors of the past or their descendants among the Saurians in the tropics. There are suggestive perspectives into the mimicry of nature, glimpses of the work of Luther Burbank, and reminiscences of the superstitious fossil-lore current among savage tribes and seriously believed by scientists only a century ago. The next paper deals with "moldavite," a puzzling glass-like mineral, which was referred to by Goethe and has since been recognized to be of celestial origin, having come down in a shower of meteors during the tertiary period. A chapter on the riddle of life begins with the experiments of Jacques Loeb and deals largely with the theories of Svante Arrhenius about the wanderings of life germs in the universe. A delightful paper, entitled "Kunckel mein Ahnherr," tells of a maternal ancestor of Bölsche, to whom the Pfaueninsel near Potsdam was given by the Great Elector in expectation of the services which the pseudo-scientist was to render the sovereign. For in this beautiful spot Kunckel conducted those alchemistic experiments which ended in bankruptcy, when the results turned out to be little more than bits of broken glass!

Helene Voigt-Diederichs has for many years been in the foremost rank of the women who are writing German poetry. Now she appears as the author of a slim volume of travel, "Wandertage in England" (Albert Langen), which as appropriate frontispiece contains a reproduction of Whistler's Chelsea Fishermen. It is an unpretentious book of random personal impressions, but it suggests a well-informed and finely receptive mind and a broad conception of life.

An interesting contribution to Goethe literature is "Frau Barbara Schulthess," by Gustav von Schulthess-Rechberg (Zürich: Schulthess & Co.). For in the circle of fair and clever women that entered into the life of Goethe, this Swiss matron deserves a prominent place, since it was in her house that the original manuscript of "Wilhelm Meister" was discovered some years ago, as also the "Gesang der Geister über den Wassern," which Goethe had written in sight of the Staubbach at Lauterbrunnen. Numerous letters from Frau Schulthess have been published in the Goethe Jahrbuch and have directed the attention of Goethe scholars to her remarkable personality. She was a sympathetic friend and faithful patron of Lavater, when he was pastor of St. Peter's Church in Zürich and an eccentric rather difficult in intercourse. Lavater's frequent reference to Frau Schulthess in his letters to Goethe led to a correspondence between her and the latter which soon acquired a degree of friendly intimacy. They met during Goethe's Swiss voyage in 1775 at the house of Lavater, and Goethe paid a high compliment to the judgment and the taste of his new friend by sending her copies of almost everything that he wrote in the following twenty years. Frau Schulthess was the type of Swiss common-sense, but she was intellectually and spiritually of finer fibre than the average Swiss woman of her social standing. A woman who could gather about her such people as Zimmermann, F. L. von Stolberg, Miller, Schlosser, the Duchess of Anhalt-Dessau, the Duke of Weimar, and keep for many years the friendship of Lavater, Kayser, and Goethe, must indeed have had a rare personality.

NEWS FOR BIBLIOPHILES.

The bibliographical history of Thackeray's ballad of "The Three Sailors," or, as it is now more commonly styled, "Little Billee," is fairly well known, but the last word has not yet been said even on that subject.

Thackeray had attained a considerable reputation both as a littérateur and as Michael Angelo Titmarsh, art critic, when returning from Cairo he found himself at Rome something of a lion among the British artists in the Eternal City. He was called upon to preside over a festive gathering at Bertini's. The festive character of the proceedings was somewhat impaired by the general discontent over a recent official appointment to the British Academy at Rome, which was highly unpopular in English circles. After a good many grumpy speeches a fresh turn was given by an artist offering to take the bass part in a glee. This was followed by a call for a song from the chair. Titmarsh had to acknowledge his inability to sing, but offered to produce a recitation if a little time were given him for reflection. The result was the ballad of "The Three Sailors," which he recited or chanted in a deep and doleful voice to the great delight of the company. One of the artists present was Samuel Bevan, who has described the scene in his "Sand and Canvas," published in 1849.

Thackeray was very unwilling that the ballad should appear, but yielded to the insistence of Bevan, who printed it in his book. Its next appearance in print was in 1864 in the North British Review, in an article upon Thackeray, and later in the same year Bevan, who had preserved the original manuscript, sent it to the Autographic Mirror, where it appeared in facsimile. It is noteworthy that although Thackeray allowed Bevan to publish the verses he did not include them in any edition of his writings which appeared during his lifetime. They were first included in 1869. It is possible that this absence of an authorized edition led to the formation of many versions differing greatly from the original. One of these that was current in Oxford University in the sixties was communicated to me by the late Mr. E. W. B. Nicholson, Bodley's Librarian, and is printed in the "Papers of the Manchester Literary Club" for 1911. Manuscript copies were also in circulation; and one of these lies before me now. It has been doubled for insertion in the pocket to be produced when needed. And further, for its better preservation, it has been put into a limp binding, such as is often used for music. It varies in several particulars from the received text, perhaps the most interesting being the substitution of the name of Nelson as the Admiral who dispenses such even-handed justice in the last verses. This manuscript has at different periods been decorated by humorous drawings, not destitute of Thackerayan flavor. There is a facsimile in the "Editor's Box" (1880) of a drawing by Thackeray in which Little Billee stands between Gorging Jack and Guzzling Jimmee.

We may sum up by saying that there are two versions of "Little Billee" showing slight differences, and both vouched for by the author's manuscript, and also a traditional version which departs very far from the original.

A fresh and curious point remains to be considered. M. Gabriel Boissy contributes to Les Annales of May 4, 1913, an interesting article on the popular songs of Provence, in which he gives the words and music of several ballads that are current in the country of Frédéric Mistral. Among the specimens of the "période ancienne" is this ballad of "Notre Dame de la Garde," which, in modernized form, reads as follows:

Y a trois vaisseaux dedans Marseille—Qui sont partis pour Malacca.

Après trois nuits passées sur l'eau,—le pain, le vin vint à manquer.

On tira à la courte paille,—pour savoir qui serait mangé.

Quand eurent tiré la courte paille,—au capitaine elle a échu.

"Ah! monte, monte, brave mousse—dessus l'échelle du grand mât."

Quand fut monté dessus l'échelle,—le mousse se mit à pleurer.

"Ah! monte, monte, brave mousse—dedans la hune du grand mât."

Quand fut monté sur la pommelle,—le mousse mit à pleurer.

"Ah! monte, monte, brave mousse—sur la pommelle du grand mât."

Quand fut entré—dedans la cage,—le mousse se se mit à chanter.

"Ah! que chantes-tu, brave mousse,—que ta chanson me fait pleurer? . . ."

"Je vois Toulon, je vois Marseille—je vois la Seyne et la Ciotat! . . ."

"Nous ferons bâtir une chapelle—dessus la roche de la mer! . . ."

"Tous les ans on y dira messe,—et le mousse la servira."

It is quite clear that we have here a relation of Little Billee, though he has been trained to pious uses. The secular and warlike spirit evident in the British ballad are entirely absent from the French song. Here we have the little middy again the hero of the occasion, although there is no question of eating him. The French captain is prepared for his fate, and only desires so much of a respite as may give him a chance of being saved by proximity to the desired-for land. There are no imputations on the guzzling propensities of any of the sailors, who, indeed, are not even named. Gallic piety is vindicated by a desire to build a chapel in gratitude for rescue from the dangers of the sea. And the little middy instead of serving under a great admiral is to have the distinguished honor of serving a priest in the celebration of the mass.

A fair question for the Thackeray experts to discuss is the precedence to be given to these two youths—the pious French middy or the bold British boy ready to undertake anything, and, no doubt, with self-confidence enough to believe that he can be successful in everything he takes in hand.

SCIENTIFIC BELL RINGING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The recent notice by your critic of Walter's "Church Bells of England" contains some statements which fail to do justice to an art cultivated in England for more than two centuries and now practiced there by 30,000 devotees in some 3,000 towers.

It should be appreciated, by musicians at least, that scientific change ringing, designated in your columns as "a most singular sport, quite unknown here," is in reality a distinct branch of music constructed on mathematical formulæ and hence perfect from its inception. This remarkable discovery of producing with certainty on a set of bells all possible permutations, or sequences, of notes served to develop the full capacity and particularly the harmonies of the instruments, and thus awakened at once an interest in bell ringing and casting. The immediate result was that societies, or guilds, were formed for the study of the art, and have since continued to flourish. In England, therefore, as in no other country, there exists an impressive method of giving dignified utterance to occasions of festivity and mourning.

As regards long-continued peal ringing, this is infrequent, and generally restricted to towers detached from dwellings; service ringing at churches is of shorter duration. At St. Paul's Cathedral, for example, the twelve great bells are swung for twenty minutes for morning and afternoon service on Sundays, and a similar custom prevails throughout the island.

So far from being unknown in this country, change ringing has been practiced since colonial days. Thus the silver-toned bells of Christ Church, Boston, imported in 1745 from Rudhall's Gloucester foundry, were rung until the outbreak of the Revolution by a band of which Paul Revere was a member; and years later, in 1825, they played a part in the public reception given to Lafayette. The peals installed in Christ Church, Philadelphia, in 1754, and in Trinity Church, New York, in 1797, were consigned to the care of change ringers. Within the ringing chamber of the Philadelphia steeple, by the way, is preserved a tablet commemorating the achievement of a complete peal of 5,040 changes of Grandsire Triples in the year 1850, conducted by that erudite composer, H. W. Haley; and here to this day the regular religious services are announced by a local band attached to the tower. At Groton School scientific ringing has been systematically taught since the gift to the institution, in 1901, of a set of eight heavy bells; and the exercise is accepted as a substitute for gymnasium work.

To return to Boston, few more proficient associations can be found than the Boston Guild of Change Ringers, qualified by years of constant practice in England to handle bells of all weights, and execute compositions in all standard methods. Though rendering service at present in but three different towers, they have the prospect of adding in the immediate future three belfries to their list. That their music, by appealing to certain temperaments, meets a genuine demand in the community is demonstrated by the frequency of their appointments and the number of admirers attracted to the towers by these aerial orchestras. From the Boston Society of Architects, the American Bankers' Association, and other organizations for which exhibition performances have been given, they have received appreciative testimonials.

Your critic is likewise in error in imagining that swinging bells are more easily manipulated when their gudgeons, or bearings, are lowered by means of a curved yoke from the level of the crown to that of the waist. On the contrary, the effect thus produced is precisely the reverse; and our local founders have been compelled to adopt this method against their better judgment solely to enable the bungling sexton to substitute brute force for the skill which is acquired only by assiduous practice. Experienced ringers know that the suspension of the bell upon the principle of the pendulum reduces to the minimum the friction of movement; increases its velocity of revolution; imparts a light, elastic impact to the clapper upon the soundbow, and augments the propelling power of the sound waves. These factors all combine to produce that superiority of tone which distinguishes a set of bells rung in peal from our more familiar chimes designed for the tapping of hymns and tunes by a single performer. In respect to homogeneous castings and accurate attunement, the products of American founders are unexcelled; but by reason of their faulty hanging and lack of certain essential appurtenances, such as stopstays, sliders, ground shievos, etc., they are unavailable for scientific ringing.

Visitors to belfries are apt to manifest surprise at the moderate muscular force necessary to guide heavy bells, properly equipped, through the maze of an intricate peal. But it is the mental faculties which are chiefly engaged. Hence, the exercise is quite as appropriate for women as tennis, golf, or rowing. Indeed, one society in England is composed exclusively of that sex; and in illustration of their accomplishments it may be added that there has been recently unveiled in Christ Church, Isle of Dogs, a tablet to record a successful peal of 5,040 changes rung in three hours by eight ladies.

There are gratifying signs that this fascinating art which gives free scope to the intellectual faculties, and is also of value from an athletic standpoint, may receive more extended recognition in America. Its introduction would insure a needed reform in the treatment of belfries, and present a novel recreation to those individuals who possess the physical organization requisite for the apprehension of this particular music. TEACHERS OF ENGLISH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The letter of "Middle West" in your issue of October 16 seems to me to make an important contribution to the discussion of the problem of required English in college. It is true that "freshman English" is often entrusted to the teachers of least experience, and it is equally true that satisfactory instruction in that kind and grade of work requires on the part of the instructor unusual skill and considerable knowledge of human nature. The difficulty is not that the instructor in "freshman English" knows too much about English literature or writes too well. The difficulty is usually that he is too young or too inexperienced, or both, to have acquired the tact, sympathy, and judgment necessary to deal successfully with such an intimate subject as composition. There is sometimes a second difficulty—that he has no clear notion as to the aim of the "freshman English" course. He does not realize what kind and degree of excellence he should require of his students. There is probably a third difficulty—that he is not in touch with the best and most progressive thought on methods of teaching composition. There may be even a fourth difficulty—that he is more interested in his own advanced research than in the gropings of the freshman mind and the falterings of the freshman pen.

In view of these difficulties, I have sometimes wondered if the following plan might not better existing conditions. If large schools must employ inexperienced teachers for freshman English, would it not be practical to put over them, as supervisor, a man or a woman of thorough training, of broad experience with men and schools, and of deep sympathies? The prospective young instructor might have a semester's course on aims and methods with this supervisor before he should be permitted to teach at all, and he might teach under careful direction until he should have found himself. The organization of the course and the management of delicate cases should be in the hands of the supervisor. The supervisor should be a person deeply interested in the problems of freshman English, and his time should be given exclusively to that course, as teacher and as director. Under his advice the young instructor could certainly avoid some of the mistakes that provoke such serious criticism.

If I may, I should like to add a few words about another topic much under discussion of late—the scholarship of the English teacher. None of us knows too much; there is not a day of a teacher's life that he does not wish he were wiser, better instructed, and more thoroughly trained. Why, then, these constant flings at young people who aspire to the training sometimes symbolized by the letters Ph.D.? All doctors are not dry-as-dusts, as every one knows who has had the good fortune to meet a fair number of them. No sensible person would contend for a moment that all scholarship is labelled with the Ph.D.; neither ought any sensible person to contend (as some seem to do) that scholarship, whether labelled with the Ph.D. or not, is a worthless and even worse than worthless product. Investigation stands for progress, and the advance of accurate scholarship in America is a matter for national pride. That is recognized abroad if not at home. Moreover, many of our greatest scholars are conspicuously broad, unassuming, sympathetic, and human in spirit, and clear and logical in method. Why be so bitter against a whole class because an occasional member of it fails to attain the high standard set before them? Surely there is nothing in scholarship and accuracy, per se, that prevents one's becoming a good teacher.

CHURCH ADVERTISING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is a tendency towards sensational advertising invading some of the Protestant churches? The papers lately brought in news of "a special baseball service" on a recent Sunday evening in one of the Methodist churches in New York city. The minister quoted from Connie Mack and John J. McGraw. Billy Sunday, now an alleged revivalist, wrote a strenuous letter, in the course of which he said: "I'll be working to beat hell all next week, but I'll lay off long enough to look at the scores." The service was attended by some of the famous players, all of whom, it is said, slipped out by a side door after the service to avoid the crowd.

This is quite interesting, and is, perhaps, typical of a tendency in some of the Protestant churches to resort to advertising methods which savor, at least, of moving-picture shows and the bargain counter.

The Protestant churches at present are in none too strong a position. Complaint is made that attendance is falling off, and some congregations bewail the scarcity of men at the services. Is sensationalism and blatant advertising a genuine remedy or merely a quack panacea?

Whatever may be the fundamental errors of the Roman Catholic Church, it nevertheless commands the respect of many Protestants, because, to a marked degree, it maintains an impressive dignity. It does not attempt to be a vaudeville or a circus, a cheap lunch counter, nor yet "a rubber-neck car" for travellers to the celestial city.

The Protestant Church still has splendid opportunities. She is to a marked degree divesting herself of many of the hideous doctrines of the old theology, and, apparently, to some extent is trying to adapt herself to theological conceptions which are both rational and spiritual. There is abundant work for her which can be most successfully undertaken in a quiet, dignified, and gentle spirit. Should not the church be a home, a place where little children are led into ways which are pleasantness and paths which are peace? Should it not furnish refreshment for the weary and a sanctuary for the oppressed? There those who battle in life should find inspiration and hope. There may fitly be spoken the final words of benediction for those who have reached the end of the journey.

The right conception is, I think, embodied in some lines of George Macdonald:

> Oh, holy Sabbath bells!
> Ye have a pleasant voice!
> Through all the land your music swells
> And man with one commandment tells
> To rest and to rejoice.
>
> As thirsty travellers sing,
> Through desert paths that pass,
> To hear the welcome waters spring,
> And see, beyond the spray they fling,
> Tall trees and waving grass,—
>
> So we rejoice to know
> Your melody begun;
> For when our paths are parched below,
> Ye tell us where green pastures glow,
> And living waters run.

MR. MOODY'S LETTERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your recent praise of "Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody" was, I think, exceptionally welcome in these parts. Only a few days earlier Mr. John Macy, a Socialist with a sprightly pen, discussing Mr. Moody's writings in the literary columns of a Boston newspaper, went out of his way to make a furious attack upon your reviewers. One of them, the late Dr. William Everett, he venomously described as "a dull scholar and a bad orator"; and he called your reviewers in general "a crew of desiccated academics," adding that "to be a member of the crew, the only requirement was, and is, to have one's brain covered with fungus (inedible)." His invective would lead the public to suppose that the Nation superciliously discouraged young American poets, and that it had treated Mr. Moody with envious contempt.

Mr. Macy could hardly have chanced upon a more inept proof of his accusation than your criticisms of Mr. Moody. To be sure, the Nation in 1899 briefly censured the florid style of Mr. Moody's introduction to an edition of Milton; but upon his really important works it bestowed from the beginning of his career the most cordial praise. As early as 1901, when Mr. Moody was almost unknown, it called attention in two appreciative reviews to his remarkable merits as a poet, and thereby it did much to establish his vogue. Throughout his career it greatly encouraged his lyric talents, and upon his death paid him a noble editorial tribute. Furthermore, we owe the only complete edition of Mr. Moody's works to another "desiccated academic," Prof. John M. Manly, who, like Mr. Moody, labors under what Mr. Macy regards as the fatal handicap of having graduated from Harvard and having taught English at Chicago.

That Mr. Moody was not at his best as a dramatist, that he created an unnatural character in the hero of "The Great Divide," that his true powers were those of a lyric poet, that his peculiar merit was to interpret lyrically the spirit of his own age—in short, every idea that Mr. Macy emphasizes in his criticism, the Nation reviewers arrived at long ago. If those ideas are sound, how did it ever happen that "desiccated academics" excogitated them? If they are "inedible fungus," how do they sprout in the brain of a social revolutionist?

OPERA IN MUNICH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Munich has been getting so much harsh criticism—some of it quite deserved—at the hands of the American musical critics lately that I beg you to allow me to defend it from the charge of having "good second-class opera," which you make in the admirable article "High Music and Plain Americanism," printed September 25. Really it is not as bad as all that, for surely performances of "Siegfried" and "Meistersinger," to cite two examples which I recently heard, with Mr. Knote, Mr. Feinhals, Dr. Kuhn, Edyth Walker, Maud Fay, and Hermine Bosetti, deserve to rank as first class. And in ultra-modern works, such as "Salome" or "Elektra," even the Metropolitan offers nothing better; the orchestra, chorus, and scenery are also of approved excellence. That in French or Italian performanees Munich is behind New York goes without saying, but what European city is not? On the other hand, the Mozart operas, except perhaps "The Magic Flute," are better sung and better staged here than anywhere else.

EASTERN EMPIRES.

Empires of the Far East: A Study of Japan and her Colonial Possessions, of China and Manchuria, and of the Political Questions of Eastern Asia and the Pacific. By Lancelot Lawton. In two volumes. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $7.50.

Can sixteen hundred printed pages of document and discussion upon Asiatic problems be made entertaining? Mr. Lawton, the London Telegraph war correspondent in Japan, has the courage to think so, as is evident in his assembling of materials for an understanding of the political questions confronting the Powers concerned in the future of the Pacific. He has, however, enlarged upon them at such length that the ordinary man will despair of ever finding time to read these sober pages, while the special student is not likely to pay much heed to his personal opinions. To be plain at the outset, his work is too much of a brief to be satisfactory as a book of reference, and too heavily loaded with pièces justificatives to stand a chance of popular approval.

Yet there is much in these two bulky volumes that is admirable. They are mainly about Japan, and might well have been called a study of the Japanese Welt-Politik. From the standpoint of an Englishman who realizes the commercial nature of this Politik on the part of a sea-Power situated like herself, it excites apprehension, and the seriousness of his fear has disposed him to examine the problem with greater thoroughness than any publicist who has preceded him. If his labors have no other result than that of impressing upon his countrymen the folly of treating Japan as a negligible factor in the civilized world, it will have accomplished all that the author expects. But his attitude is rather too controversial to obtain for him a patient hearing from both parties. He has nothing good to say in behalf of the English alliance with Japan. It is his conviction, after several years of residence in the East, that it is a one-sided arrangement into which England was pushed by fears of Russian aggression and of isolation in Asia, from which, however, Japan has procured every advantage, chiefly through sharp practice. It remains today an alliance with irksome obligations that compel England to exalt the prestige of Japan at her own expense and to the detriment and cost of her own colonial possessions. Under its protection Japan has been free to intrench herself to the prejudice of every European state, including her ally, while the only Power that has shared with her any advantage obtained in Manchuria is Russia, with whom she has joined hands perforce in a grand robbery.

Without conceding the justice of the criticisms upon British policy in treaty revision there is fair ground on the part of the Powers for dissatisfaction with Japan's conduct in Korea and Manchuria, but the main source of the difficulty lies in the fact that she has sought for herself all the profits to be derived from intimate knowledge and propinquity, while the Western Powers are so imperfectly informed and so remote from the region of commercial competition as to be disadvantaged from the outset. The contrast between Japan's fair promises to preserve an open door and her brusque determination to keep it open for herself alone may not be moral, but it is extremely human. To call it "Asiatic" is only to say the same thing.

If England is unable at present to regain the benefits of equal opportunity in South Manchuria the ultimate solution of the trouble must be looked for in the countervalling efforts of Russia in the same territory. Nothing can be gained by denouncing the treaty and making an open enemy of Japan. Two equally selfish Powers like those now contending for mastery on the Pacific seaboard are bound, so long as they continue in rivalry, to leave some openings for outside influence. If the antagonism endures, the cost of military preparation will exhaust one party or the other until he is willing to purchase support from an outsider by commercial concessions; if it returns to normal economic conditions and exploitation is desired, the outsiders who have most labor and capital to offer are sure eventually to be called upon. In the latter case the Chinese will provide the labor and the Anglo-Saxon the capital.

In describing the efforts of Russia to regain her position in the Far East, Mr. Lawton provides an informing chapter on the projected Amur Railway. He does not appear to reflect that her faith in her own destiny, as shown by this colossal project, is a sufficient guarantee of her determination to hold Japan in check and, incidentally, to afford openings for foreign capital. In a paragraph, which does justice to Russia's ambition, we are told that > her course is as irresistible as that of the mighty river along whose wild bank she will carve her way. Like the Amur itself, she has encountered, and will yet encounter, difficulties of the most stupendous character. Confronted by obstacles no less formidable in the sphere of human effort than those mountainous and rocky obstacles of Nature which checked the Amur in the mysterious, silent past, she twists and turns but does not retreat. She bores her path onward to the great Pacific outlet, and, like the Amur again, all the signs are that, having achieved her object, she will so broaden and deepen her course that never can human agency overwhelm or divert her. There is still in Russia the impatient, determined spirit of that Czar who flouted the perplexities of engineers by calling for a map and drawing a straight line between St. Petersburg and Moscow upon its surface, decreeing that this was the route for a railway. It matters not that the vast territories through which the Amur Railway must go are unexplored, or but partially surveyed; the construction of the line is resolved upon and completion is only a question of time.

Which means that Russia is prepared to expend upon 1,300 miles of railway through a wilderness under the Arctic Circle nearly as much as we have spent upon the Panama Canal, and thereby open to exploitation a territory about the size of Alaska and probably twice as valuable.

As an observer, Mr. Lawton has the advantage of a professional training and is at his best. Nothing in the book is so good as the chapters called Sidelights on the Russo-Japanese War, in which he tells us what he saw personally and describes the qualities of both the combatants with candor and considerable acuteness of comment. As an historian, however, he displays a lack of the same degree of training. His résumé of the history of Japan and its change of government, though evidently submitted to competent critics and purged of prescriptive misstatements, is unsatisfactory, because it deals with historical material after the manner of the journalist. A single illustration of what is meant must suffice. The summary compares Japanese and European feudalism without noting the important difference that in Japan the Samurai collectively were professionals in a much stricter sense than were the knights, that they owned no land, and that the system there did not rest on tenure for military service, while the peasant, who had nothing to do with the military, held his fields direct from the overlord—a fundamental dissimilitude that rather vitiates the comparison. The chapters devoted to the Constitutional period afford a full and on the whole a fair account of the process by which Japan exchanged an antique autocracy for the machinery of Western governments. It does not appear from the author's description of the home politics of Japan to-day that parliamentary institutions there are in any adequate degree representative of the will of the people. It is still a country governed, as of old, by men who hold themselves responsible to their clans rather than to the nation, or even to the Emperor in whose name every measure is advocated. The adoption of European laws is regarded as equally abortive because "the code recognizes a European morality which must be impracticable for many years among an Eastern people with Eastern traditions, an Eastern temperament, and an Eastern faith; and it embodies ideals for which political parties with conscientious scruples have fought for long but never yet attained. It may be regarded as prescient rather than practical, but nothing could indicate more distinctly the difficulties which Japan has undertaken to surmount in order that she may preserve her position in an altered age."

From history and politics the author passes in turn to the question of Asiatic immigration and the attitude of America and the British colonies towards the Japanese. He does not believe that white men are the victims of blind folly or race prejudice in opposing Oriental labor. "They are merely asserting the principle which has governed nations from time immemorial, a principle which decrees that the peoples of the earth who have lagged behind in the scheme of civilization shall pay the penalty of their tardiness. If the Oriental races wish to override that principle, they can only achieve their object by force of conquest. If they choose this, the only means of attaining their object, will they find the white man prepared to meet them?" The proposition is at least frankly presented; the only solution suggested, until the struggle comes, is rapid white colonization. As a whole, the book, though prolix and venturing upon too many topics, is one of sufficient study and discernment to deserve a place among the best upon modern Japan.

CURRENT FICTION.

The Joy of Youth. By Eden Phillpotts. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

In "Widecombe Fair," we have been told, Mr. Phillpotts deliberately and definitely concluded his series of Dartmoor tales, intending to busy himself in the future with a very different sort of work. Different this story is, in setting and detail, but not, we find ourselves gratefully noting, in its human substance. We are unable to agree with his latest American publisher (oddly enough, he has had half a dozen of them thus far) that "in this new vein Mr. Phillpotts can hardly fail to attract a wider circle of readers." Such element of novelty as it has, unless its character of timeliness makes it carry, is not of a sort to tempt the palate of the general.

As usual with Mr. Phillpotts, the scene opens with a meeting between the hero and heroine. This time, to be sure, they meet not on some high tor or by some painted wood of Dartmoor, but in the cast-room of the British Museum. The background is as carefully arranged, and as important, in one instance as in the other; only here it embodies the majesty of Art as the more familiar setting embodied the majesty of Nature. The hero is, in fact, a young artist, a painter, paradoxically modern, who adores the Greeks and boasts himself one of them, and for the rest swears by Nietzsche and Schopenhauer. Scion of an English county family, and very rich, he has chosen Florence as his home, and merely happens upon the British Museum and the heroine during one of his flying visits to England. There, providentially, he "collides heavily" with that young lady; and talk ensues. They have not met, but have common acquaintance; indeed, she is betrothed to a man of his own county. She has an affection for that man, but there is young blood and new blood in her veins, while he is a reactionary, a Briton of the old school. That, at least, he is in feeling if not in act; the fox-hunting, for-God-and-country squire of old would never have permitted his lady such prenuptial freedom as Sir Ralegh Vane yields to his Loveday. But if the godlike young painter is to carry her off, Sir Ralegh himself is to be consoled with a mate of his own kind.

Meanwhile, the story. Loveday procures leave of absence, and wanders and worships in Italy, under chaperonage, with Bertram the painter. She is very beautiful, and he cherishes a dream of getting her to pose as Venus in his half-finished masterpiece. When he finally suggests it, she is affronted, but, presently discovering, on the eve of parting, that she loves him, she offers herself for his model, as the greatest service she can do him. He thereupon discovers that he loves her, and therefore cannot permit her to be Venus for his brush—pretty matter for a lover's quarrel, of which, with the aid of Sir Ralegh, the end is comfortably in sight.

This narrative is adorned with a great many pages of brilliant talk about "Ruler-Art," which may be enjoyed for their own sake by the few who know enough to enjoy them. In human substance, as we have hinted, the narrative is very much like Mr. Phillpotts of Dartmoor. Loveday, in her healthy innocence and beauty, is sister to his heroines of moor and tor; Bertram might, but for his education and special bent, be one of those forthright, independent shepherds and crofters of old acquaintance. Above all, these people have a frankness of speech and a directness of action which belong to a world, we suspect, purely Phillpottsian.

A Narrow Way. By Mary Findlater. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

It is an odd fact that while slow-witted people are often lovable, slow books very seldom are. Perhaps the reason is that when one finds a book dull one generally throws it aside before one has had time to grow fond of it, while in the matter of people one cannot be so reckless. Here, at any rate, is a novel which, while not brilliant and hardly even interesting, is sure to make a pleasant impression if one will give it a chance. The heroine in particular engages one's affections. She has been brought up by the strictest of maiden aunts in the narrowest of suburban worlds, but, unlike most modern heroines in such circumstances, she is neither melancholy nor rebellious. Her high spirits and warm affections outlast a childhood in which running is a misdemeanor, and going out when there are clouds in the sky a hazardous undertaking. Though not, so far as appears, as clever as we are told she is, she has a quick intelligence and a happy faculty for deriving amusement even from the most annoying circumstances.

It is Kitty alone that gives life to the book. (One wonders, by the way, whether the prototype of Kitty is not really the "old lady" to whom the very charming dedicatory poem is written.) The hero is not nice enough for her, and one cannot help feeling—though the thought seems not to occur to the writer—that he is rather selfish, under the circumstances, to snatch her up. Such is our faith in Kitty's talent for happiness, however, that when the marriage is finally brought to pass it is not for her we are sorry, but for the merely hypothetical young wooer who should have appeared to claim her.

The Desired Woman. By Will N. Harben. New York: Harper & Bros.

Whatever qualities Mr. Harben's work may lack, it is at least as indigenous to America as "The Old Homestead" or "Way Down East." And it has not a little of that engaging crudity which helped to win those stage classics their enormous public. The style conforms to the best rural usage, hesitating between broad vernacular and the stilted and "elegant" speech which is supposed to belong to town culture.

The hero and the villain are Atlanta men, and partners in the conduct of a bank. The Desired Woman is a mountain girl of supernal beauty and amazing power of mind. The villain wins her heart, but casts her aside in order to make a rich marriage. The hero, who has long loved the girl in secret, resents this treatment of her, but apparently it does not occur to him to break partnership with the wicked one. He merely devotes his life to serving his adored at a distance, asking nothing. The villain has a suitably unhappy time of it in wedlock, but he is finally released by the death of his wife and child; whereupon the self-effacing hero fancies it is all over with his hopes:

> "Oh, God, is it actually to be?" he groaned inwardly. "Ought it to be? Here am I, eager to gratify her every wish, while he can give her only the dry, crushed remains of his manhood, a bare scrap of his past affluence. He scorned the sweetest flower of womanhood that ever bloomed, and now crawls through his own mire to pluck it!"

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The United States and Mexico, 1821-1848. By George Lockhart Rives. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 2 vols. $8 net.

The history of our Southwest is closely connected with that of Mexico. It is, however, usually found incorporated in the general history of the nation or grafted on the history of Texas. It is Mr. Rives's purpose to rescue it from such an environment and to make it a continuous and self-centred narrative. In his second volume he gives us a comprehensive history of the Mexican war, and in the first he treats with equal detail the story of the events which led up to that war. It is not a part of his plan to give merely the leading events; but there is care to tell all that seems essential to the correct understanding of the narrative. The scope of the first volume is seen from the fact that one chapter treats of the Florida treaty of 1819, another of the Mexican revolution against Spain, two of the characteristics of the Mexicans, another of northern Mexico, another of the settlement of Texas, while another, on Mexican politics, brings the reader to the beginning of the quarrel which resulted in Texan independence. To that struggle five chapters are given, Texan annexation and its diplomatic relations with the United States and Mexico are treated in six chapters, and the political phase of annexation gets five chapters.

Probably the first thing that impresses the reader when he takes up the book is the absence of that partisan tone which formerly made a treatment of this period either an anti-slavery or a pro-slavery argument. It is a pleasant surprise to find at last that we are dealing with a national movement, like other notable extensions of our frontier. Mr. Rives willingly admits that the South wished to extend the area of slavery, but he does not make that the occasion of arousing the resentment of the reader. His detachment is, no doubt, most unaccountable to certain older writers, but the modern student who believes that the sectional ebullition was a temporary though violent phase of our history will not be disappointed. Such a student may well ask that slavery be placed somewhat in the background so that he may see some of the other things which made up the history of the day.

Mr. Rives has written a scholarly and readable book. He has used the sources, manuscript and printed, with care and discrimination. He seems to have overlooked no important material. He has drawn from works in Spanish and French languages as freely as from English books. He has included many pertinent quotations. His characterizations of men and parties are vivid, yet judicial. The footnotes, bibliography, and index are excellent, and there are good maps.

A particularly commendable feature of the book is the full appreciation it shows of the point of view of the Mexicans. These people, we are reminded, are either full-blooded Spaniards, full-blooded Indians, or persons born of a union of the two stocks. They are high-spirited by inheritance. They do not employ reason when it is a question of preserving their national integrity. They consider their civilization the oldest and best in the Western Hemisphere, and they are not willing to accept the prevalent American feeling that they are inferiors in either courage or ideals. If we would understand the Mexican, we are told with convincing arguments, we must be able to take his point of view. It may be added that from the time when John Quincy Adams attempted to purchase Texas for a mere song to the beginning of the Mexican War our attitude was just that which would most irritate the Mexicans. Students of existing problems may find in the perusal of these pages some useful suggestions on a present vexing problem.

Mr. Rives has not hitherto appeared before the public as a writer of history. He is described as a busy man of affairs who has never written a doctor's thesis, although he has long been a trustee of Columbia University. It is undoubtedly a pleasant thing to have a good history on the old lines, one in which human interest is not slighted, and in which the political and military affairs of the actors of history are held to be as important as the wheat supply. It is also a wholesome thing that we have another good historical writer who is not at the same time a teacher of history. This can be said without reflection on the teachers. They have done a vast deal to advance the cause of sound history. Their burrowings have been remarkable, their insistence on method has been invaluable, and they have made excellent collections of sources. Most of their efforts have been without specific monetary reward, or the hope of it. But the teacher may be a very bad writer of history. The pedagogical temperament is frequently the opposite of the writer's temperament. It may stand for attention to detail, for evenness of emphasis, whereas the good writer must have power of synthetic arrangement and great facility of expression. Thus it has turned out that while we have had some excellent writers among the teachers, we have had many who made historical literature a dull and lifeless waste. Along with the rise of the new school came the tendency to push into the background the older type of historian. He who was not a professor dared not do more than prepare a memoir, or write popular narratives in some of the more realistic fields. Some eminent exceptions have occurred, as Mr. Rhodes and Mr. H. C. Lea. It is encouraging to see another effort like theirs. It is the opinion of the reviewer, though himself engaged in college teaching, that American historical literature would be enriched if we had more historians whose principal business was not history teaching. They would be men who could devote all their energies to the interpretation of the facts collected by the diligent university investigators.

Football for Public and Player. By Herbert Reed ("Right Wing"). New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.50 net.

Many persons think of football only as a spectacle attracting thousands, as the gladiatorial games attracted the multitude in the Roman Empire. To others football is merely an expression of the vitality of youth and a manifestation of college spirit. Only a few realize the scientific nature of football preparation and play and the ethical value of its training. This volume, written by an enthusiastic believer in the game, one who has had experience as player, student of the game, and sporting writer, emphasizes these more important aspects. Though written both for public and for player, the book is neither a detailed and technical description of the fundamentals of the game nor a mere picturesque recital of the more dramatic elements. It assumes that the reader has a knowledge of rudiments and rules and that he desires to know something about the finer points of individual technique, of team play, system, and generalship. After reading the book the ordinary spectator will find his enjoyment of the game increased many fold; the lover of the game will be impressed with the enthusiasm, wide knowledge, and excellent judgment of the author.

An introductory chapter contrasts the English and American games of football, showing the suitability of the latter to American climate and temperament. This is followed by a very interesting, though somewhat overdrawn, parallel between football and warfare, in which the author compares line play to infantry, wide running to cavalry, and the kicking and passing game to artillery. The general similarity of the strategy and tactics of football and of warfare is pointed out, the use of the kicking or passing game as a "demoralizer," followed by the concentration of the greatest number of men upon the weakest point of the enemy when the time for "shock action" arrives, being a standard form of football generalship.

The greater part of the volume deals with football from the coach's standpoint, few persons having a wider acquaintance among football experts or a more comprehensive knowledge of leading styles of play than the author. The relation of captain and coach, the value of the trainer, the principles underlying the selection of material for the various positions, and the standard formations of attack and defence are considered in order. Numerous diagrams illustrate the formations and shifts used by leading teams, and more than a dozen excellent photographs of actual games bring out features of both individual play and concerted team work.

Perhaps the most interesting section of the book deals with the basic principles of generalship. The author divides the field of play into zones, taking into consideration the wind, and the distance of the ball from goal lines and from side lines, and outlines the general style of play that is most valuable and most objectionable in each zone. The author is a firm believer in the "loose ball" game, and for a team equipped with a good punter no fault with his general policy can be found, save that in football as in warfare the best strategist sometimes does the least expected thing, and success or failure rather than sound theory is occasionally the best test of generalship.

In a chapter intended for the ordinary spectator the author notes the mistaken policy of choosing seats near the side lines rather than high in the stands, and of watching the game as a whole rather than the work of individuals, of the line as a unit, or of the backfield as a team in interference. The ability to dissect the play of a team and to discover its elements of strength and weakness is most difficult for the ordinary spectator to acquire, but adds much to an intelligent appreciation of the game. A brief and convenient summary of the penalties that may be imposed is included in this chapter.

A number of broad generalizations are made concerning types of teams. The author notices that Western teams emphasize the offence and Eastern teams the defence, that the former are more radical and the latter more conservative in adopting innovations, and that the former depend much upon trick plays, the latter rather upon sound theory. Yale teams are characterized by "power and resource," Harvard by "brilliance," Princeton by "speed," and Pennsylvania by "variety." Yale is usually superior in line play, Harvard has better backfields, and Princeton excels in following the ball. The Army and Navy are well drilled, but erratic in execution, and the Carlisle Indians are noted for the variety of their attack, while seldom having a well-rounded team. Among the smaller colleges Trinity is mentioned as having the most distinctive system. The author notes, however, the general tendency towards standardization of play, and believes that the differences in the various systems of play are disappearing.

A brief chapter discusses genius in football, giving numerous examples of remarkable individual feats. Along this line Princeton has contributed more than her due share. The closing chapter considers the ethics of the game, commenting on the recent improved spirit of sportsmanship and of courtesy between contending teams and on the more satisfactory relations between athletics and scholarship. In physical makeup the book may be criticised for its too frequent typographical errors and for its lack of an index. "Touchdown" at the bottom of page 119 should obviously read "touchback."

The Poem Book of the Gael: Translations from Irish Gaelic Poetry into English Prose and Verse. Selected and edited by Eleanor Hull. Chicago: Browne & Howell Co.

The appearance of a new Irish anthology at once raises in the mind the query whether there is room for another such publication. With respect to Anglo-Irish verse, that is, to the English poetry written in Ireland, the answer might perhaps be in the negative. For many collections of Irish-English poetry have long been in circulation, and there exist two excellent anthologies of recent date, Brooke and Rolleston's "Treasury of Irish Poetry" and "The Dublin Book of Irish Verse." But with the Gaelic poetry of Ireland the situation is different. While some modern songs have long been popular in English versions, very little has yet been done towards compiling representative collections from the whole poetic literature, whether in the original Gaelic or in translation. Moreover, new pieces of value and interest are constantly brought to light by scholars, and the whole work of selection and translation will have to be done over repeatedly for many years to come. Irish prose, thanks partly to Miss Hull herself, and in still larger measure to such translators as O'Grady and Stokes and Lady Gregory, is already well known to English readers. Some acquaintance with the great popular hero-tales of mediæval Ireland has come to be a part of general literary education. But the Gaelic verse, which is still only imperfectly known to the specialist, is far harder than the prose to present to a foreign public. Apart from the universal and inevitable difficulty of translating poetry, the Irish metres are so elaborate, and the language is so different from English in form and syntax, that the interpreter is at a special disadvantage. Every skilful and intelligent attempt, therefore, to make this body of literature better known and understood should be heartily welcomed.

The books with which it is most natural to compare Miss Hull's are Dr. Sigerson's "Bards of the Gael and the Gall," published in a revised edition in 1907, and Prof. Kuno Meyer's "Ancient Irish Poetry," published in 1911. But her work differs in important particulars from each of these collections. Dr. Meyer's volume deals only with the older poetry, which it presents in closely faithful, though thoroughly idiomatic, prose translations. Dr. Sigerson includes selections from Gaelic poetry of all periods, translated by the author with much skill in imitation of the rhyme and metre of the original. Miss Hull's collection resembles Dr. Sigerson's in its range, but is rather more extensive and includes, in particular, a number of modern Irish pieces only recently made accessible. In her translations the editor follows no single method. Sometimes she uses metrical versions made by others, and among these are a number of good ones that have been hitherto unpublished. Often she makes her own rendering, either in verse or more literally in prose. It happens, consequently, that independent versions of some of the best poems are found in all three of the collections named, and it is often interesting and illuminating to compare them. Not because of essential differences in interpretation, for the day is now past when reputable translators from Irish indulge in wild guess-work, but because the varying versions may show the English reader exactly what the problems of the translator have been. In general, the metrical renderings are more successful in the case of the modern pieces, the rhythm of which is closer to English, than in the case of the ancient poems with their strictness of form and parsimony of words. But the effort to achieve the almost impossible is always tempting, and probably few students have ever read the Old Irish jeu d'esprit on the scholar and his white cat without trying to get it into English verse. Perhaps no one has succeeded better at this particular task than Mr. Robin Flower, whose version appears on page 132 of Miss Hull's book; but he has fallen far short of the neatness of the original. A number of the other verse translations from early classical metres are more successful, and one of the most notably effective is Miss Hull's own rendering of the remarkable "Song of the Old Woman of Beare" (p. 147).

Of some importance from another point of view is Miss Hull's opening selection, a translation of long portions of the "Saltair na Rann." This is a difficult old Irish poem of the tenth century, and her version, the first published translation of any considerable part of the poem, deserves favorable recognition as a specimen eruditionis. The place of the "Saltair" in Irish literary history is also important, but we should not say that its intrinsic excellence would entitle it to stand in a selected list of poems of permanent and universal interest. The same remark would apply to a number of the little prayers and incantations—interesting specimens of popular verse—included among the selections from Modern Irish. But Miss Hull doubtless did not mean to compile a strict sort of anthology on the model of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." That engaging task is still left for somebody else to perform, and her collection will be of great help to the person who undertakes it.

Miss Hull's introduction does not attempt any historical survey, but comments with intelligence and sympathy on some of the characteristic features of Irish poetry. She speaks of its elaboration of form, which gives evidence of long and systematic cultivation of the art, and also of the range and refinement of the sentiments it expresses. And she insists particularly, we are glad to note, on the joyousness of much of the early poetry—"more robust in the pagan, gentler and more reflective in the Christian," production. Her observations on this subject, it is to be hoped, may help correct prevailing misconceptions as to "Celtic melancholy."

English Local Government: The Story of the King's Highway. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. New York: Longmans, Green, & Co. $2.50 net.

The output of what is sometimes called "the Webb laboratory" continues to maintain its accustomed standard of excellence, even though Mr. and Mrs. Webb and their secretarial staff pursue their investigations somewhat after the manner of a tariff board drafting a report on the wool schedule. All these volumes on English local government have the earmarks of an official statement made to order with a proper background of historical investigation and a very unmistakable group of recommendations for improvement. In fact, we believe that Mr. and Mrs. Webb would frankly accept such characterization as true to their intention, and would agree that they deal with the past chiefly to show the need of reform in the present and to strengthen their argument as to the way such reform should be effected. There is no essential difference between the minority report of the Poor Law Commission, drawn up a few years ago by the Webbs and issued in a style uniform with the local government series, and the other volumes of that series, which deal with county, borough, manor, and parish. All are in the fashion of Parliamentary blue books, though the product of private enterprise and supported by ample private means.

In a series of studies, at once so comprehensive and inclusive, by-products are inevitable. One of the most notable of such by-products is that which forms the subject of the volume here under review: the King's Highway. To the Webbs its story seemed worth the telling as a study in administration. Therefore, before proceeding with the original plan of continuing their treatment of the structure of local government with a description of the various statutory local government bodies, which will form a third treatise supplementary to the "Parish and the County" (1906) and the "Manor and the Borough" (1908), they have issued in a single volume of more than 250 pages a history of road administration in England, and are to follow it up with a revised bibliography of roadmaking and maintenance which will include no fewer than 6,000 items.

To be attracted by the subject of this volume the reader need have little interest in the "problems" of the present or concern for the reformation of local methods of control, such as is sought for by the writers of all these volumes. He will find the novelties of the subject a sufficient inducement to peruse the work. The story begins with earliest times, though conditions before the sixteenth century are dealt with very briefly in a single chapter, and covers the days when roads were used only for foot service, of men and animals; continuing through the days of horse-drawn vehicles to the last half-century of bicycles, tricycles, motor-cycles, motor cars, and motor omnibuses, which are revolutionizing the whole method of road construction and control in the United Kingdom and Ireland. The bulk of the volume is taken up with the story of the turnpikes and the turnpike Trusts, the glorious era of the stage coach, the "calamity" of the railways, the work of "Pontifex Maximus" Telford and "the magician," Macadam, and the extraordinarily futile efforts of nineteenth-century statesmen to grapple successfully with a problem that was construed as a local matter at a time when increased governmental control had already become a necessity. The latest road-using vehicle, the motor omnibus, which is proving terribly destructive, not only to life and limb, but also to the road surfaces, is introducing a factor of tremendous importance to those concerned in the upkeep of the roads. Though England has to-day a larger mileage of dustless roads than any other country, and is spending for the United Kingdom nearly eighteen million pounds a year on the administration of highways, a sum apparently far in excess of the total road expenditure of any other country, yet the standard of maintenance is rising, and the demand for the future of a road that shall be a "solid, coherent, waterproof, convex-surfaced, decently side and subsoil drained mass, secured against elemental disturbances under suitably proportioned working heads," is raising a serious financial problem. To the solution of this problem the last chapters of this volume are an important and suggestive contribution, and they cannot but be of interest to every American reader whose pleasure or business it is to travel on the King's Highway, or who is called upon to face similar road conditions in his own country.

The Problem of Evil in Plotinus. By B. A. G. Fuller. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.25 net.

It is to be feared that the title of this book, to most of those whose eyes fall upon it, will suggest a work of highly specialized learning applied to highly abstract speculations. Those who for this reason pass the volume by will overlook an excellent piece of literature dealing with the most poignant and human of philosophical questions and one of the most profound and human of philosophers.

The problem of evil, in the most general sense, is the heart of the religious problem; since religion is that part of human life which stands at the point where men's judgments concerning what is good, and their judgments concerning what is real, meet and press for final and practical adjustment. The question, therefore, is the one among the topics of philosophy which has, perhaps, played the greatest rôle in untechnical reflective literature. It is the theme of the three most typical and influential of English religious poems—one representing the Puritanism of the seventeenth century, another the Deism of the eighteenth, and the third, "In Memoriam," a phase of latitudinarian Anglicanism of the nineteenth.

The reasonings which enter into much modern reflection on this theme, as well as into such mediæval dealings with it as are exemplified in some notable passages of the "Divina Commedia," can be clearly traced back to those ideas of the Platonism of later antiquity which owe their fullest and most coherent expression to Plotinus. The connection between the thought of the ancient philosopher and the arguments of eighteenth century optimism, illustrated in the second of the English poems mentioned, is peculiarly close. If Pope learned the theodicy versified in the "Essay on Man" from Bolingbroke, Bolingbroke in turn evidently "conveyed" it from Archbishop King; and King, for the most part, merely transmitted the assumptions and arguments which had come down through the schoolmen from neo-Platonic sources. The favorite notion of the Enlightenment that the "best of possible worlds" must abound in all possible grades and diversities of being—and therefore all possible degrees of imperfection—was precisely the cardinal principle of the emanationism of Plotinus. But this notion yielded, so to say, diverse by-products, which had nothing directly to do with the problem of evil. It had, for example, a distinctly "romantic" tendency, quite out of keeping with the usual assumption of eighteenth-century rationalism, that all life, all art, and all institutions should be made to conform each to a single "standardized" model of excellence. There was, again, an odd incongruity between this assumption of Deistic theology, and the assumption of much eighteenth-century political theory, that the best of possible societies would be one in which all the members were equal—and as much alike as possible.

So wide-reaching are the historic bearings of the theodicy of Plotinus, of which Mr. Fuller has given us the first thoroughly satisfactory presentation in English. His book, however, is by no means of a purely historical interest. He deals also, penetratingly and honestly, with the great problem itself; and, like many of the most serious of contemporary writers on the philosophy of religion, arrives at a species of dualism as his conclusion.

Notes

The tenth volume of "The Cambridge History of English Literature," entitled "The Age of Johnson," is about to appear from the Putnam press.

The same house has in hand for this season: An illustrated edition of Thomas Hardy's "Under the Greenwood Tree"; "Ethics and Modern Thought: A Theory of Their Relations," being the addresses which were recently delivered by Rudolph Eucken at New York University; "The Book of the Dead: The Papyrus of Ani," a reproduction in facsimile, edited, with hieroglyphic transcript, translation, and introduction, by E. A. Wallis Budge, keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities in the British Museum; "England Since Waterloo," by J. A. R. Marriott, the concluding volume of "The History of England," edited by Charles Oman; "Old Court Life in Spain," by Frances Elliot; "My Path," a volume of memoirs by Lilli Lehmann, and Byron's "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," edited by A. Hamilton Thompson, the last a Cambridge University Press book.

"The Colonizing Activities of the English Puritans" is the title of a book by Arthur Percival Newton, which is announced by the Yale University Press. The work has an introduction by Prof. Charles M. Andrews.

Prof. Eduard Prokosch will bring out, through Holt, a "Lese- und Uebungsbuch."

George W. Jacobs & Company have in preparation a "Life of Raphael Semmes," by Colyer Meriwether, and "Hunting in the Upper Yukon," by Thomas Martindale.

Mr. Reginald Wright Kauffman has completed a new novel of New York life, called "The Spider's Web." It will be brought out by Moffat, Yard & Company.

Smith & Elder are issuing this week the full account of the British Antarctic exploration, under the title "Scott's Last Expedition." The work is in two volumes, the first to contain the journals of Capt. Scott, the second the scientific investigations undertaken by Dr. Wilson and others of the party. This material has been arranged by Mr. Leonard Huxley, and there is a preface by Sir Clements Markham.

Prof. I. Gollancz has edited for the Oxford University Press "Patience, an Alliterative Paraphrase of 'Jonah' by the Poet of the 'Pearl.'" It is the first instalment of a series of Select Early English Poems of which Professor Gollancz is the editor. The next four numbers of the series will be "The Parliament of the Three Ages," "Winner and Waster," "Death and Life," and "Scottish Field." In each instance there will be a facsimile of the manuscript.

"Castelvetro's Theory of Poetry," by H. B. Charlton, is announced by the Manchester University Press.

The Geographical Journal for October contains an instructive account of the American Transcontinental Excursion of 1912 organized to celebrate the sixtieth anniversary of the foundation of the American Geographical Society of New York. Mr. G. G. Chisholm deals with the economic aspects of the excursion. Mr. H. O. Beckit, of Oxford, describes some of our national parks, and Mr. A. G. Ogilvie gives his impressions of the vegetation of the United States. A fairly realistic idea of the geography of our country is gained from them. There is also given Prof. H. N. Dickson's presidential address to the Geographical Section of the British Association, in which he discusses the urgent problem of "finding suitable accommodation" for the increasing population of the world. He believes that there will be an increase of the growth of immense seaports like London and New York, while the geographical causes for the establishment and maintenance of other great cities are steadily diminishing. Since we are making serious inroads on our resources, he holds that we should address ourselves to a stock-taking of them and suggests the formation of a committee jointly by the great national geographical societies for collecting the necessary information.

The relation of Rumania to the Balkan question is shown by Mr. Frederick Moore in the National Geographic Magazine for October. Although the existence of a secret treaty with Germany and Austria is doubtful, he says that Rumania is recognized as a "silent partner" of those countries. It has a remarkable prosperity, its rich soil ranking it among the great grain-growing countries of the world. Mr. George Kennan graphically describes his unusual experiences during a journey in the Caucasus. In its nearly twelve million people there are forty-six different nationalities, and the language "changed every ten or fifteen miles." He found a remarkable similarity of some of the mountain villages with an Arizona Indian pueblo, illustrations of both of which are given, and their folklore is strangely alike. The mysterious life of the common eel is the subject of an interesting article by Fish Commissioner Hugh M. Smith, and the wonderful success of the anti-typhoid vaccination in our army is described by Mr. A. G. Grinnell. There was not a single case of typhoid fever in the first nine months of the present year.

We may record here the appearance of two more volumes in Macmillan's Fiction Library: Pierre Loti's "Disenchanted" and Mrs. Humphry Ward's "History of David Grieve."

A collection of jests and funny anecdotes, suitable for the after-dinner speaker, has been made by Thomas L. Masson and published by Doubleday, Page & Co. Mr. Masson's connection with Life ought to make him a good judge in this sort of thing.

The scholarly monographs and notes of the late Prof. Frank Egbert Bryant, of the University of Kansas, have been put together in a memorial volume entitled "A History of English Balladry and Other Studies" (Badger). Everything contained in it has been printed elsewhere except the essay which gives its name to the collection. This is a careful examination of the comparatively few popular ballads that come down to us from a period before the seventeenth century, and of many metrical compositions which in one way or another resemble ballads, but are not. Owing in part to the absence of convenient summaries and in part to the lack of any clear definition of the literary form under discussion, the essay leaves on the mind of the reader, in spite of interesting glimpses of the conditions surrounding the production of popular literature in England, a strong sense of agitation rather than advance. Much of this impression is doubtless due to the confessedly unfinished state of the author's manuscript. Probably he is more adequately represented by the only other paper of considerable length, a sharp criticism of the psychology of descriptive writing as formulated in Lessing's "Laocoön." The remaining notes serve chiefly to complete the record. Opinions may conceivably differ about the perfect good taste of the introduction, but there can be no question that no honor was done to the memory of a conscientious scholar by neglecting to correct in proof the quotations in Early English.

Failing to find in the Oxford Dictionary not only such "well-known words" as "Africander," "Africanderism," and "Africanderdom," but even "African," the Rev. Charles Pettman, a resident of the Cape for nearly forty years, has come forward to supply the lack a hundredfold. His bulky volume, "Africanderisms: A Glossary of South African Colloquial Words and Phrases and of Place and Other Names" (Longmans, Green), is full of interest for the philologian, while the American layman with any Dutch leanings can also spend a pleasant hour in its pages. Though there are relics, especially in place names, of several tongues in the language of the Cape—of Portuguese, French, Bushman, Hottentot, Bantu, etc.—it is the intermixture of Dutch and English words and idioms which constitutes the main basis of this study. Descendants of the good burghers of New Amsterdam will be pleased to learn that among the English on the Cape the "stoop" is a respectable, dignified part of a house, and will meet with a distant acquaintance in the "brandewijn" bush. Older generations of New Yorkers will doubtless not have to be told that "inspan" and "outspan" denote hitching and unhitching, respectively, and that "slim" and "stout" can conceivably mean cunning and impudent, respectively. But the New Yorker's interest in this volume will come not so much from finding parallels as from observing what his own speech might have become had English control of New Amsterdam been deferred for a century or so. He might still call the kick-off in football the "aftrap"; might ask a friend, "Are you going with (along)?" He might have to punish his child for "rolling on the floor and coming home full of mud," the "floor" meaning "ground," and "full of" being no worse than "splashed with." And anything not more than a moment old would be "splinter new." Devotees of last cries, by the way, will linger over another word in use on the Cape—"askoekklop," a Hottentot dance, so named by the Dutch because of the similarity of the sound which it makes to that produced by knocking together cookies baked in wood ashes [asch+koek+kloppen].

One result of the entente cordiale has been to inspire Frenchmen and Englishmen with an inclination to arrive at a better understanding the one of the other. Not all of the books written to satisfy this laudable aspiration can be said to achieve the end desired. Such a volume, indeed, as Laurence Jerrold's "The French and the English" (Dodd, Mead) seems calculated in some respects only to darken counsel. Mr. Jerrold is partly the victim of his Chestertonian method, a tedious didacticism even in the hands of Mr. Chesterton himself, and holding infinite peril for one less skilled than he in the art of inversion. The method is simplicity itself: in differentiating the national qualities of the French and the English the author takes a characteristic that is commonly supposed to be peculiarly British and proves conclusively, to his own satisfaction, that it can more properly be applied to the Gallic nature. Then he reverses the process and demonstrates beyond the shadow of a doubt that some traditionally French quality is in reality one of the most conspicuous traits to be found in the character of the typical Briton. The principal result of two chapters of laborious epigram and antithesis is to inform the reader of the facts, with which he is possibly already familiar, that the Frenchman is an extremely practical person and that the Englishman conceals within his bosom some of the qualities of the visionary. Mr. Jerrold's volume is more exasperating than it might otherwise be, because one feels that he is really familiar with his subject, and that, if only he would avoid patent exaggerations and the temptation to excessive smartness, he might have written a book that would have been of value in interpreting French character and national life to English readers. The critical chapter on Poetry is good, and that on English Men and French Jeunes, contrasting the youth of the two countries, reveals insight and sympathy. But the work is crowded with statements unsupported by other evidence than the writer's own conviction of the moment. This is particularly noticeable when he is speaking of his own country, on which occasions the Chestertonian method comes into prominence. Mr. Jerrold seems to understand France rather better than he understands England.

A far more instructive book, even if it be written with the rather self-conscious solemnity of the feminist, is Mlle. Claire de Pratz's "France from Within" (Doran). After a girlhood and schooldays spent in England, Mlle. de Pratz returned to her own country and was for some years a professor in a lycée of Paris. Through connections in the Government she has also been in close touch with the political as well as with the social life of the capital. She is absolutely bilingual, and her English style has possibly gained from the habit of clarity of expression which is the genius of the French language. Consequently, both the matter and the manner of what Mlle. de Pratz has to say concerning the characteristics of the two countries and the contrasts in their respective points of view are well worth the hearing. Her experience qualifies her to contrast the educational ideals of the English and the French, and it is on this topic that she is most illuminating. The most fundamental difference, she finds, in the two ideals is that expressed by the French words "éducation" and "instruction," the former representing the moral and the latter the intellectual side of a child's training. In English there is no such sharp distinction between the two, both being included in the word "education."

The "well-educated" man in England is the man who has been submitted to the discipline of a public school, and that very discipline is the side of his education to which most importance is attached. Whatever of moral training the Frenchman has received he owes to home influences; his school is concerned only with his intelligence. And even at home, where the English parent emphasizes the moral aspect of an act, the difference between right and wrong, the French parent appeals to the æsthetic nature of the child. "Ne fais pas cela, mon chéri," cries the French mother; "ce n'est pas joli." The act is not wrong so much as it is ugly; "the good" and "the beautiful" are one and indistinguishable. Mlle. de Pratz rightly emphasizes the value of the philosophical training which forms so important a part in the curriculum of the lycée, as enabling the pupil "to coördinate the whole of his previous learning and to map out a programme for future self-culture." The description of the girls' lycée in Paris, where the author was herself a professor, is extremely interesting. The feminist movement in its French manifestation is well described. French women, we are told, have "chosen the right means of gaining their ends with regard to their rights. They quite understand that in their own country they must be 'feminine' in order to be 'feminist.'" Later chapters give intimate particulars of the ménage of the ordinary French family. Mlle. de Pratz is admirably impartial, and has a nice sense of perspective. As an interpretation of French life for English readers, her book is one of the best of the many that have recently appeared.

To the Home University Library, Prof. George Foot Moore, of Harvard University, contributes a volume entitled "The Literature of the Old Testament" (Holt). The plan of the larger, more technical "Introductions" is followed: a sketch of the formation of the canon, a chapter on the Old Testament as the national literature of the Hebrews, and a presentation of the literary character, composition, date, and authorship of each book or group of writings. The treatment is popular, but thoroughly scholarly. The conclusions are those of modern criticism, without vagaries or extreme positions. The general reader will find in the volume sufficient information to enable him to read the Old Testament as modern historical students understand it, although for proof of the positions assumed he will be obliged to refer to more elaborate works. Professor Moore's scholarship is so thorough and his mastery of the facts so complete that he is able to single out the salient and important and to avoid confusing the reader with a mass of detail. One has only to compare his exhaustive commentary on Judges in the International Critical Commentary with the nine pages on that book in this volume, or his masterly essay on Sacrifice in the Encyclopedia Biblica with his treatment of the same subject in the chapters on the Pentateuch, to marvel at the success with which he has held himself in curb. It will be difficult for any one to prepare a better popular manual of introduction to the Old Testament.

The career of John Paul Jones offers an inviting subject to the biographer because it has an important bearing on American history and because it deals with a most attractive personality. In the first sense Jones was the founder of the tradition of a brave and successful American naval officer. What Nelson was to British naval men and Jean Bart to the Frenchmen, he was to those who serve our own country at sea. He entered the navy in a crowd of incompetents, men whose sea experience was derived from the merchant service of the maritime colonies, and who had little understanding of the dash and unrelenting courage necessary to make a great fighter. Above such men he was lifted by his impetuous will, his disdain of intrigue, and his insatiable thirst for glory. His was a figure around which romance naturally gathers. On the one hand, his written life presents an excellent picture of the shortcomings of those who launched our Revolution, and it shows us the many difficulties with which the naval branch of the Government was surrounded. On the other, it is a picture of wonderful achievement, a picture which the man of average taste and purpose will ever like to see. How popular it is may be understood from the fact that the latest biography ("The Sailor Whom England Feared," by M. MacDermott Crawford; Duffield & Co.) is the fourteenth that has appeared since the death of Jones, to say nothing of several novels whose theme he has been, among them romances by James Fenimore Cooper and the elder Dumas.

If one demands a life of Jones in the best sense, he will be disappointed in the book under review. It lacks historical perspective, it confines itself to the deeds of its hero, it is not critical in even a slight degree, it does not rest upon research, and, in short, its historical significance is small. It is filled with overstatement and contains some misstatements. For example, Benjamin Franklin is characterized as "the heavy-jawed old Quaker" (p. 97). The phrase is erroneous as well as offensive; Franklin was not a Quaker. In another place we read: "The navy was controlled by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, and John Quincy Adams, its virtual dictator, filled the desirable posts with those who had the luck to please him, without the slightest reference to their fitness" (p. 65). John Quincy Adams was nine years old when the Revolution began. That John Adams did not appreciate Jones may well be true, but he assuredly thought he was acting for the best interest of the service in seeking to advance sea-captains from his own State. As a personal biography, Mr. Crawford's book has a better standing. It contains energy, motion, and imagination. The language is simple and direct. The formal arrangement of the parts is natural, and although the irrelevant matter is sometimes in bad taste, it is not abundant. There is a deal of human action in the book, and wicked men and beautiful women all play important parts. It is a readable one-volume biography and gives one the flavor of Jones's remarkable life of adventure. For those who do not wish to read the longer work of Mrs. de Koven, reviewed in the Nation July 17, 1913, it will prove an entertaining book.

"Rival French Courts" (Macmillan) is the somewhat ambiguous title under which S. H. Lombardini has written a readable and well-informed account of the experiences of Madame de Staal Delaunay at Sceaux, at Versailles, and in the Bastille. Mademoiselle Delaunay's youth, in a convent and then in the family of the Marquis de Silly, was full of joy and love; by her grace and wit she was the acknowledged queen of a small circle of admirers. But towards the close of Louis XIV's reign fate placed her as a lady-in-waiting to the eccentric Duchess of Maine. This capricious duchess, daughter of a still more capricious father, was by birth a Condé, and, having married one of Louis XIV's recognized bastards, nourished hopes of becoming Queen of France after Louis XIV's death. Meanwhile, before that event had taken place, she dared to shake off the oppressive yoke of Versailles and seek pleasure in her own way as queen of a topsy-turvy rival court, with pretensions to wit and literature, at Sceaux. In 1718 she involved herself and all her household, including Mlle. Delaunay, in the famous Cellamare conspiracy, and in consequent confinement in the Bastille. Mlle. Delaunay's imprisonment lasted eighteen months, but was not without compensations of a romantic sort. After her release she again became lady-in-waiting to the Duchess, and was conveniently married to a Captain in the Duke of Maine's Swiss Guards, named De Staal. Her memoirs, published soon after her death in the middle of the eighteenth century, were much read at the time. They are the outpourings of a clever mind and of a sensitive, philosophic soul, with a note of sadness running through them. Sainte-Beuve said they ought "to be re-read at the beginning of each winter, at the end of autumn, beneath the November trees to the sound of the falling foliage." Mr. Lombardini's biography is made up for a considerable part of generous selections from these memoirs and from letters which Madame de Staal wrote in 1747.

Mr. Edmund Gosse has been appointed an officer of the Legion of Honor in recognition of his services to French literature in England.

Price Collier died suddenly on the Island of Funen, in the Baltic, where he was a guest at a shooting party. He was born in 1860, and received his early education at Geneva, Switzerland, and later at the University of Leipzig. In 1882 Harvard gave him the degree of bachelor of divinity. For two years he was European editor of the Forum, and during the Spanish-American war was an officer in the navy. His reputation as a writer rests mainly on his studies of various nationalities, his last work, "Germany and the Germans from an American Point of View," having caused considerable discussion. Other books from his pen include "Essays: Mr. Picket Pin and his Friends," "America and the Americans from a French Point of View," "A Parish of Two," "England and the English from an American Point of View," and "The West in the East from an American Point of View."

Science

The Yale University Press will publish a second set of lectures on "Water Conservation by Storage," by F. H. Newell.

Prof. W. A. Noyes is preparing for Holt "A Textbook on Chemistry."

The eleventh annual report of the Reclamation Service presents a brief review of the work accomplished during its ten years' existence under the direction of F. H. Newell. The fundamental object of the service is the reclamation of arid lands by irrigation, with the result of providing many homes on small farms; for "with high-grade fruit culture even five acres will support a family, and is regarded as a competence." The number of independent farms now served is about 14,000, and is steadily rising; projects now planned will irrigate an area several times as great as that already utilized. One of the fallacies shown in ten years of practical experience is that reclamation is not cheap; the cost of permanent dams and canals is relatively high; much higher than the temporary works of pioneers. Another early fallacy was that after water is provided in the main canals, no further cost would be called for; as a matter of fact, much work has still to be done in preparing fields for best service from the canals and ditches; work is also needed in the construction of drains, by which to withdraw the irrigation water and prevent the accumulation of alkali. One of the greatest difficulties is to procure the right kind of farmers for the cultivation of the reclaimed land. The new settlers are not like the early pioneers; they show less spirit of coöperation than the early communities possessed, and the present settlers on irrigated lands are not so capable of adapting themselves to the conditions that they find there as were their less aided predecessors. It was expected, when the service was started in 1902, that the farmers themselves would construct the smaller distributing canals; but experience has shown that this also must be done by the governmental service; thus thousands of small structures, such as gates, flumes, siphons, culverts, and bridges, have been built, as well as enormous dams and long main canals. The rigid enforcement of the Eight-Hour law has increased the cost of construction; for when half an hour additional work would complete a job, it is stopped at the end of an eight-hour day, because no discretion is left to the employer; and it is then necessary to bring a gang of men back again, sometimes over a considerable distance, to finish some minor detail. An important branch of the service is the irrigation of the lands of Indian reservations, for which several projects are now in construction. The total net cost to June 30, 1912, has been $72,042,173.07. The report presents many other details of interest.

One of the useful volumes in the already large series of Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature is Prof. T. B. Wood's "The Story of a Loaf of Bread" (Putnam). Inasmuch as the author has treated the various aspects of the wheat-growing and manufacturing industries in a somewhat popular though scientific manner, the book is not without considerable interest and value to the general reader. For the serious student of agricultural economics or of industrial and mechanical science, however, it contains little that is new. After presenting in the earlier chapters a sketch of the growing and marketing of wheat, Professor Wood proceeds to a discussion of such investigations as are in progress to the end of improving the quality of the cereal, from the standpoints of both the farmer and the miller. In some respects, this is the most interesting and important part of the volume, for it includes a treatment of such matters as selection and hybridization, on the one hand, and of impurities in the grain and percentage of water in the kernel, on the other. Then follow short chapters on the milling industry, baking, the chemical composition of bread, and its food value. A classified bibliography is appended containing not only the main sources which have been drawn upon in the preparation of the volume, but also the best literature for the interested reader to consult whenever further information is desired.

Drama

A new book promised shortly by Macmillan is "John Millington Synge and the Irish Theatre," by Maurice Bourgeois.

A volume of two plays by Brieux, "Blanchette" and "The Escape," will be issued by John W. Luce & Company, with a translation by Frederick Eisemann.

"Tante," the play which the English dramatist, C. Haddon Chambers, has built upon the foundation of Anne Douglas Sedgwick's novel of the same name, and which has just been produced in the Empire Theatre, is one of the best light comedies presented in this neighborhood for a considerable time. Dramatically it is not very strong, for it is deficient in action, and the climactic scene arises from conditions which are barely credible, but it is full of exceptionally good character drawing and is uncommonly rich in witty and satirical dialogue. From first to last, it is consistently amusing. Unlike most pieces of a similarly humorous character, it has a definite purpose—to which it adheres steadily and effectively—the ridicule of the so-called "artistic temperament," the contemptible meanness, vanity, and envy which too often underlie it, and the essential hollowness of most of its pretences. The heroine, known as Tante to her intimate circle of sycophants, is a brilliant pianist, whom incessant adulation has converted into a creature of utter insincerity and selfishness. Her most affectionate demonstrations are heartless poses, designed to extort admiration. She has adopted a ward—for her own gratification—upon whom she lavishes endearments, but when the girl—who is her devoted slave—wins the love of a man who is too clever to be imposed upon and too honest to flatter, she agrees to their marriage, with the deliberate intent of separating them afterwards. In this she succeeds temporarily by an insidious appeal to the young wife's gratitude, which is supposed to be stronger—this is the weak spot in the plot—than her love for her husband. But in her moment of apparent triumph her insensate jealousy impels her to reveal herself in her true colors, and the reconciliation of her victims naturally follows. The moral of the piece is conveyed in the ultimate exposure and defeat of Tante by the two persons, the young husband and an old female companion, who never accepted her at her own valuation, or paid the least attention to her tantrums. There is some degree of legitimate exaggeration in the piece, but the spirit of it—for which a liberal amount of credit, of course, must be allotted to the original author—is thoroughly sane and wholesome, especially in these days of artificially manufactured reputations. Ethel Barrymore, an attractive actress of limited capacity, plays Tante with a certain amount of mimetic cleverness, but very little insight or real power. But she was supported admirably, especially by Charles Cherry, who gave a highly finished and forcible embodiment of the downright sensible husband; Eileen van Biene as the wife, and Haidee Wright as a shallow and venomous little parasite. This is a play which merits and seems assured of success.

Cyril Maude, one of the most popular of London's actor-managers, made what was virtually his first appearance in this city in Wallack's Theatre Monday evening in his favorite part of Christopher Bingham in Capt. Marshall's comedy, "The Second in Command." The play is tolerably well known in this country, John Drew having been very successful in it years ago, and needs no description here. It does not carry its age well. The artificiality and improbability of the plot, with its swift succession of convenient coincidences and calculated climaxes, stand out more aggressively than ever. But the military interest, the sympathetic if somewhat trite characteristics of the central personages, and the brightly humorous dialogues still exert a potent theatrical charm. As the kindly, honest, brave, unselfish, but somewhat stupid Kit Bingham, Mr. Maude made an emphatic personal hit. It would be absurd to attempt any formal estimate of the abilities of an actor, noted for his versatility, after a single performance, but he is evidently a comedian of rare intelligence and accomplishment. His impersonation, Monday evening, was absolutely human, lifelike, and consistent. The character seemed to fit him like his own skin. He was particularly effective in those passages where he had to express the inarticulate emotion of a deeply sensitive but shy man, in which the perfect simplicity and naturalness of his methods were exceedingly attractive and convincing. The humorous side of the part he illustrated with delightful lightness and vivacity. But he must study the peculiar acoustic properties of the house. Monday night he was sometimes almost incomprehensible owing to the lisp, presumably assumed, with which he spoke. He appears to have some exceedingly capable actors in his company, notably Mr. Montagu Love. His daughter, Margery Maude, has a refined and pleasing personality, but could scarcely be playing leading parts if she were not the daughter of the manager.

"Androcles and the Lion" having failed to attract at the London St. James's Theatre, Granville Barker and Lillah McCarthy will revive John Masefield's translation of the Norwegian play, "The Witch," first introduced to London by Miss McCarthy in January, 1911. She will, of course, be seen in her old part of Anna Petersdotter, the weird woman who, inheriting preternatural powers from her witch-mother, eventually uses them to her own undoing.

Woman is at last to have a theatre of her own in London, to be called "The Women's Theatre." The new enterprise owes its birth to the Actresses' Franchise League. It finds a home at the Coronet, where on Monday, December 8, a beginning will be made. For the occasion, Mrs. Bernard Shaw has translated Brieux's three-act play, "La Femme Seule." The principal part has been accepted by Lena Ashwell, with whom will be associated Sarah Brooke, Nina Boucicault, and Fisher White. "La Femme Seule" will be given on three evenings of the week, and Björnson's "A Gauntlet," with Miss Ernita Lascelles as Svava, on the others.

The London Daily Telegraph announces that a site has been selected for the proposed Shakespearean Memorial National Theatre in London. It lies somewhere in the neighborhood of the Academy of Dramatic Art:

> The ground covers an area of an acre and a half, more than sufficient for all necessary purposes. The price will absorb pretty nearly all the funds at present in the hands of the organizers, and the vital question, consequently, remains—where is the money requisite for the building of the theatre to come from? Still, now that they have something concrete to go on it is by no means improbable that subscriptions will flow in more freely than hitherto; in any case, the transaction, regarded merely in the light of an investment, is a sound one.

Music

Gustav Mahler. By Paul Stefan. New York: G. Schirmer. $2.

Tschudi, the Harpsichord Maker. By William Dale. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50 net.

Charles Dickens and Music. By James T. Lightwood. London: Charles H. Kelly. 2s. 6d.

"In view of the fact that Mahler died some time ago, it becomes the duty of conductors and the public to take cognizance of his works." This sentence, from a provincial newspaper, written in perfect naïveté, amusingly indicates the usual German attitude towards men of genius. Gustav Mahler was quite as great a composer as Richard Strauss, and as an operatic and concert conductor he was second to none the world has seen; yet as long as he lived he was constantly harassed and abused, and to his compositions little attention was paid till after his death. He had ardent advocates in the newspapers, and in 1908 one of these, Paul Stefan, published a book, "Gustav Mahler's Heritage," in which those who had hampered the great conductor in Vienna were severely taken to task. Subsequently, Herr Stefan brought out "Gustav Mahler: A Study of his Personality and Work," of which in a few years four editions were sold, bearing witness, like the concert programmes, to the greatly increased interest in his works; and this little book has now been translated faithfully by T. E. Clark in the hope of paving the way for Mahler in England. There is likely to be a greater demand for it in New York, where Mahler aroused so much enthusiasm as conductor, for several seasons, of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

During the season that Richard Wagner conducted the Philharmonic concerts in London he was not permitted to put more than two or three of his own compositions (selections from his operas) on the programme. Mahler, without being forbidden (for he made his own programmes), put on only a very few of his many compositions during his activity in New York. He disliked forcing himself on the public; Herr Stefan relates that while he was director of the Imperial Opera in Vienna he forbade the artists there to sing his lyrics, lest he should be suspected of influencing them, or they of seeking for favors. Stooping to conquer was an attitude he never indulged in; on the contrary, he cultivated the gentle art of making enemies by rigidly living up to exalted ideals, which provoked the wrath of performers and hearers alike. Interesting details regarding his conflicts are given by Herr Stefan.

In Vienna, as in New York, there were outbursts of pedantic wrath at the alleged liberties he took with the scores of Beethoven and other masters. We cannot too strongly urge the reader to peruse pages 49-57, on which are reprinted Mahler's remarks in answer to these charges—remarks which must convince any one that it would have been "no less than sacrilege" for Mahler not to edit the scores as he did, following the example of Wagner. For Beethoven, so great was his adoration that he performed twenty-five of his works, as against only fifty-two by all other composers. The public was in Vienna, as in New York, entirely on his side. Not only was the house sold out when he conducted a Philharmonic concert, but the concerts sometimes had to be repeated—a thing unheard of before or since. The key to his great success was hinted at by himself in a letter he wrote in 1884 to Angelo Neumann asking for a position, in which he referred to himself as one "who is not without the power of breathing fire and enthusiasm into works of art, and also into the artists taking part."

In Herr Stefan's brief sketch of Mahler's career we get interesting glimpses of men who helped him, among them Hans von Bülow, Anton Seidl, and Arthur Nikisch. Sixty pages are devoted to a brief description and estimate of his ten symphonies and the other compositions, of which a full list is given in the appendix. The author writes of these with enthusiasm as well as critical insight.

William Dale's book on Tschudi, the harpsichord-maker, gives a brief but vivid account of one of the most distinguished London craftsmen of the eighteenth century, who, though a foreigner by birth, identified himself completely with the musical and social life of his adopted home and became the founder of one of the leading firms of piano manufacturers in England. Tschudi and his son made 1,200 harpsichords during their career; these were highly valued by Handel, and their fame spread to Germany, to which one was sent for Frederick the Great. The author explains why harpsichords were replaced by pianofortes, the demand for which, for practical as well as musical reasons, soon far exceeded the demand at any time for harpsichords.

Another aspect of musical life in England is presented in Mr. Lightwood's book. This writer inclines to the belief that no great author has made a more extensive use of music to illustrate character and create incident than Charles Dickens; and he thinks that, from an historic point of view, these references are of the utmost importance, because they reflect to a nicety the general condition of ordinary musical life in England during the middle of the last century. With painstaking care Mr. Lightwood has gathered the references to music and musicians scattered through the novels and other books, and he suggests to club members that a pleasant evening might be spent in rendering some of the music thus referred to. A list of the songs and instrumental pieces alluded to is included in the book. It does not indicate that Dickens was interested in classical music; his taste appears to have been strictly English. After visiting St. Peter's at Rome, he wrote: "I have been infinitely more affected in many English cathedrals when the organ has been playing, and in many English country churches when the congregation have been singing." His predilection was for national airs and old songs, his knowledge of which was extraordinary. His special aversion was church bells, on which he waged as fierce a war as on itinerant musicians.

For several years there were few musical entertainments in this city worth mentioning before the 1st of November. This year they began with a rush before the middle of October, for no obvious reason, unless it be that the Century Opera Company set the pace. But whereas last year the violinists had the right of way, the pianists predominate this season. Maud Powell and Cordelia Lee, to be sure, have been heard, but they were outnumbered by the pianists, among them some of the most prominent artists in the world—Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, Teresa Carreño, and Paderewski. Harold Bauer gave a unique aspect to his recital by putting only two composers on his programme—Bach, who was represented by three preludes and fugues, and Beethoven, three of whose sonatas Mr. Bauer played in the true classical style. Teresa Carreño, who is distinguished not only as the leading pianist of her sex, but as the composer of the national hymn of Venezuela, was much applauded at the first Philharmonic concert for a performance of Tchaikovsky's first concerto, which proved that in her sixtieth year she still holds her own for brilliancy, power, and charm. Josef Hofmann, who began as a boy, when he played like a genius, and then degenerated into a youth of mere talent and routine, to rise again, in his manhood, to the stature of genius very little below that of Paderewski, played, among other things, Liszt's wonderful sonata with an elemental power, an insight, and an artistic absorption which made a sensation. The climax came, nevertheless, with Paderewski's playing of Chopin's sonata with the funeral march, last Saturday. In the German part of his programme there were noticeable traces of the illness which had delayed his appearance by a fortnight; but when he reached Chopin his patriotic enthusiasm, combined with his supreme artistry, gave results that thrilled the hearers. Paderewski never heard Chopin, nor Liszt, yet no pianist, unless it be Rubinstein, ever played their works with his consummate art.

The notorious theft of the Mona Lisa from the Louvre is to be made the central theme of an opera composed by Max von Schillings, the well-known conductor of the Württemberg Court Opera at Stuttgart.

Le Ménestrel informs the world that Richard Strauss's latest work, "Potiphar's Wife," is almost completed. It is to be a musical pantomime or "wordless play," unfolding a series of Biblical pictures and incidents. The idea of the piece did not take root in Strauss's mind or in that of his collaborator, Hoffmansthal. It originated with a German nobleman, Count Kessler, who resides mostly in France; while studying the picture in the Louvre, La Chasteté de Joseph, he was struck with the possibility of turning the Biblical story to account in the form described. To Strauss, who happened to be in Paris at the time, and to Mr. Diagalew, the director of the Russian Ballet, he communicated his ideas on the subject, and both of them approved enthusiastically of the project.

One of the most popular of Viennese plays, Arthur Schnitzler's "Liebelei," a study of every-day life, the tragic happenings of which are recounted in distinctly Viennese parlance, was set to music a few years ago by a German composer, Neumann by name, and produced with success in Frankfurt, where he is conductor. Later the opera reached Berlin, and now it has been given in Vienna, where Schnitzler's drama is as familiar as household words. The unpretentiousness of its pleasing score, its excellent musical qualities, and, above all, the refreshing melodiousness of many numbers, earned for it a friendly reception. This is easily understood when it is recollected how very few operatic works that have been brought out during the past years in Germany have aimed at anything else but abstruseness and eccentricity.

Art

Art and Common-Sense. By Royal Cortissoz. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75 net.

For his memoirs of Saint-Gaudens and La Farge the veteran art editor of the Tribune is widely known, but this ingathering of newspaper reviews and notices, with a few more ambitious magazine articles, presents even more interestingly a distinct critical personality. Mr. Cortissoz flies the flag of common-sense. For minute analysis or cheese-paring erudition he has scant sympathy or respect. Let a man express his likings and dislikes clearly without probing pedantically into remoter causes—such seems to be his law, while amenity is assuredly his gospel. The main thing is to be understood, and never to be tedious. This policy, which Mr. Cortissoz pursues with marked success, writing as he does a lucid and gentlemanly English, has respectable precedents for itself. Vasari must have had a very similar ideal when he wrote his immortal "Lives." In this spirit Mr. Cortissoz discusses the present state of European art, including the Post-Impressionist and Cubist movements, Velasquez, the art of the Prado, Pintorricchio, Carpaccio, Whistler, Sargent, Rodin, Alfred Stevens, Sorolla, and Zuloaga—to name only representative subjects.

At the outset Mr. Cortissoz admits that "there are some impenetrable mysteries about a great work of art." It is a notion that never troubles him thereafter. Indeed, he is so cautious in avoiding the impenetrable that he remains cheerfully at the rim of most critical problems. Not always. Of a calculating type of talent or somewhat cold genius, he is an excellent critic. It would be hard to find within equal compass anything more just and illuminating than the essay on the work and personality of Whistler. Again the common-sense tactics triumph in avoidance of fads and specious popularities. Mr. Cortissoz sees through the flimsy texture of Sorolla's art, laughs the Expressionists out of court, and notes unflinchingly the going off of Rodin. At times, however, common-sense becomes almost indistinguishable from carelessness or whim. There are essays of exceeding thinness—Rembrandt, Greco, Goya, for example. It is amazing to read that Raphael's exquisite portrait of Castiglione for some mysterious reason lacks precious quality as paint, almost stranger to be told that Rembrandt generally has this preciousness, and otherwise is a rather simple and honest realist. Titian, too, is not precious in his surfaces. Obviously, common-sense uses the word precious in some sense unfamiliar to mere persons of taste. To be precious as regards paint is to resemble closely Vermeer, Chardin, or Alfred Stevens. It all sounds a little too easy.

Perhaps the most interesting group of papers is that concerning four great American architects, Richardson, Hunt, McKim, Burnham. Yet here also the casual and gentlemanly way has its disadvantages. Mr. Cortissoz's only reply to criticism of the bad planning of the Boston Public Library is, "I have never gone broodingly about the testing of its every corner." Full information could, of course, have been had by going cheerfully to almost any librarian, and, to many, a waiver of consideration of the plan of a building must seem also a waiver of the entire critical issue. In the case of Zuloaga, Mr. Cortissoz's aversion to a certain dryness and slowness of workmanship with harshness of color is merely an indirect and unhappy way of saying that he doesn't like Zuloaga's grimness. All the alleged technical defects enumerated are necessary qualities in the expression of a particular kind of mood. It would have been simpler, briefer, and more colloquial, and as criticism equally convincing, to say "Damn Zuloaga!"

We have wished to put fairly the two aspects of common-sense as the critic's guide. It will take him safely and pretty far, but not very high. For a book on art that runs off like good talk, gratitude is due. Mr. Cortissoz has in ample measure the scholarship he treats so cavalierly in others. For years he has provided in New York journalism, a pretty rare article, a sane, independent, fully informed, and entertaining criticism of current and older art. The gleaning from many years which this book offers recalls vividly past obligations and raises the hope that now and then in the future Mr. Cortissoz may consent not to be sensible. To find him in a mood of unreasonable doggedness or of positively indiscreet enthusiasm might well lend added savor to a second collection of essays. There must be moments when the ensign of common-sense may safely be dipped.

We may expect from Holt this week "On the Truth of Decorative Art," by Lionel de Fonseca.

"The Cubies' A B C," promised this week by Putnams, is a satire on the Cubist movement containing verses by Mary Mills Lyall and pictures by Earl H. Lyall.

"Thomas Jefferson as an Architect and a Designer of Landscapes" is the title of a forthcoming book (Houghton Mifflin), by W. A. Lambeth and Warren H. Manning.

Finance

WALL STREET AND THE BANKING BILL.

Whether the controversy over the banking and currency bill, and the fear of trouble if it passes, are actually dominant influences on financial sentiment is a question which Wall Street would probably find it difficult to answer. There are several peculiar things about the discussion of the banking bill, and one of them is the difficulty of getting its hostile critics to agree on what kind of trouble it would create.

Side by side, one of the critics will set forth the inevitable contraction of credit which the bill would cause; another, the inevitable credit inflation. One bank president points out the danger of political control—even if applied to the national supervisory board alone, and not to the regional reserve banks; whereupon another eminent bank president proposes as a remedy a bill applying political control to a central board and all its branches. Having learned, by perusal of the text of the pending bill, that the regional banks determine how many notes should issue, and are compelled to keep a large cash reserve against them, the public is all at once confronted with the argument that the notes are Government fiat money, issued without limit and without the maintenance of any reserve whatever.

The fiat-money argument impresses the bystander's imagination; yet somehow it does not seem to worry him, and for this the reason doubtless is his vague suspicion that the argument is based on a certain (perhaps unconscious) jugglery with words. Fiat money, as the Century Dictionary defines it, is "paper currency issued by a Government as money, but not based on coin or bullion; paper currency containing no promise to pay coin, and, therefore, not convertible into coin." Now, the pending banking bill provides that, before any given amount of notes shall issue, a regional reserve bank shall apply for them; that it shall pledge with an agent of the Government an equivalent amount of prime commercial paper; that it shall keep at all times, in its vaults, lawful money in the ratio of one-third of its outstanding circulation. Only then is it possible for a note to get into outside circulation, and the bank must always be ready to take it up in cash. In all these points the machinery merely duplicates the present National Banking law, under which all banknotes are printed by the Government and issued to banks by the Controller, but only when an equivalent amount in Government bonds is lodged by the bank with the United States Treasurer, and when a redemption reserve in cash has been established.

On what, then, is based the allegation of "fiat money," in the case of the new law as compared with the old? Undoubtedly, on the language of the pending bill, declaring the notes to be "obligations of the United States," which the present national bank currency does not profess to be. The Government, to be sure, would have no more power to increase outstanding note circulation than it has to-day—probably less, because, under the present law, an issue of Government bonds automatically increases the banknotes. The currency would be better insured of redemption (since the cash reserve maintained against it is much larger) than are the present banknote issues. But the notes are declared to be obligations of the Government and "advances to the banks"; the reserve is put up by the banks, not by the Government; are not the notes, then, when they are first created, fiat money?

It is a pretty case for argument—which, indeed, becomes more interesting, the more the actual facts of the note-issue machinery are ignored. It is an argument in which either side can seemingly prove its thesis, if the premises on which its reasoning is based are admitted. In such a case, the real solution will usually be found by some one who applies to the problem the methods of simple common-sense. Such a person, if familiar with the history of the pending bill, would say without much hesitation that its statements as to "Government obligations" and "advances to the banks" are no less senseless and superfluous, and no more an authorization of fiat money, than if the British Exchequer were suddenly to declare that Bank of England notes are a loan by the British Government to the Bank. But he would also probably conclude that, inasmuch as superfluous and senseless declarations are a blemish in legislation, those declarations should be stricken from the pending bill—even if the process were to hurt the feelings of that eminent economist in whose behalf they were probably slipped in, our peripatetic Secretary of State.

Noyes's Textbook of Chemistry

By W. A. NOYES, Professor in the University of Illinois. xv+602 pp. Large 12mo. $2.25.

This book, intended for a first course in chemistry in college, is somewhat smaller in size than the majority of college textbooks of the subject in current use, and is suited to those students who have never had any previous study of chemistry. It differs from the usual science textbook in avoiding dogmatic statements by leading the young student to see for himself how chemical theories have been evolved from experimental facts. Of course the most recent theories and the new advances in Applied Chemistry are included.

Essays for College Men

Edited by NORMAN FOERSTER, FREDERICK A. MANCHESTER, and KARL YOUNG, of the University of Wisconsin. 390 pp. 12mo. $1.25.

This collection of fourteen essays will be useful wherever need is felt for reading of an intellectual nature in connection with composition courses. Since the essays deal entirely with questions of education, science and art, the book has unity of purpose, and care has been taken to choose only essays which are clear and simple. Among the authors represented are President Wilson, Newman, Huxley, Tyndall, Arnold, and William James.
